One of the great difficulties we encounter is the enormous probable cost of the canal, for now it is mere guess-work and estimates may not come within many millions of what it will actually be. If the difficulties in the way of its rapid completion are half as great as many experienced men have conjectured, there is only a remote possibility that it will be finished so as to be of benefit to commerce in the next five or ten years. If it were the only possible way to get to the sea, I am free to confess, knowing the importance of the undertaking and the incalculable losses that the producers are sustaining each year for want of transportation, that I would vote to commence that work let the cost be what it might. But we cannot get ready, make the preliminary surveys, soundings, and bearings for a long time to come; and as every day is valuable to a country that is overburdened with productions with no adequate means to transport it to market, why not permit an enterprising citizen, backed by capitalists who have confidence in his genius, to attempt the jetty system, costing the Government nothing unless he succeeds in the enterprise? He only asks to be paid after he has demonstrated that a depth of water sufficient to float the largest steamer is made and maintained for a twelvemonth. Should he not be permitted to try the experiment at his own expense, especially as it can be done before the surveys, borings, and soundings can be completed for the canal? We lose no time by giving this permission, and we waste no money.

I believe it is generally conceded that an open river mouth, unimpeded by locks and dams, is far preferable to a canal. A free channel to which our own or foreign commerce will pay no tribute, and large enough to accommodate the commerce of the Mississippi Valley now and for ages to come, is what we are aiming at. You must remember that this commerce is only in its infancy, and must go on increasing as the population and productions increase. Suppose the canal was completed and came up to the full measure of expection; not many years could elapse before the West, so capable of subsisting a dense population, so rich in every kind of resources to invite the wealth and enterprise of other lands, would send such an enormous commerce down this river that could only find an easy and cheap outlet by a free channel to the ocean.

It is evident to my mind that the experiment of jetties must be tried to meet the necessities and demands of production. What sensible reason is there, then, for putting off the day, and in the mean time go to the expense of many millions to build a canal that will not meet the demands of commerce? The canal is not even located. It has a name that indicates its locality; but there are many of great experience and knowledge, accumulated by long familiarity with the Mississippi River, who believe it would be a great folly to expend money on it at or near Fort Saint Philip. An intelligent writer of this class, and I believe a citizen of New Orleans, in a recent article on this very point utters the following timely warning:

> But even if it were possible within a reasonable time, and at a reasonable expense, to build this canal, it is located at the wrong place.
> If the ground and surroundings were just as good at that place, as anywhere else, or even better, yet it should not be built at that particular place, simply for two reasons, the first of which is that the Mississippi River where it runs nearly or quite due west, at the lower end of the great English Turn is washing away the firm earth with such rapidity that already thousands of acres have gone into the river, and but a very narrow strip of hard land yet remains before the Mississippi will join the salt water at that point, and if the junction is made when the river is at its flood Fort Saint Philip will be left high and dry; there will be no river and no water for nearly forty miles above it.

These difficulties presenting themselves at every turn, it will take a long time before this location can be made, and all this time the West and South is to wait, her grain and cotton paying tribute to the railroad monopolies that now do the carrying trade to the Atlantic coast.

Another reason for being very careful before money is spent is, that the proposed mouth of the canal will not be safe from the future encroachments and blockade. If we go to the expense of millions to build a canal and we find the termini or mouth of our great work so embarrassed by physical causes that it may prove no better, even far worse than the present river mouth, what a national folly it would be. Suppose we look at the facts and see if we are not in danger of running at full speed in the face of insurmountable obstacles, and instead of our canal ending at Breton Bay we find the open deep sea still beyond. You will never master the situation until you have emptied the waters of the Mississippi into the ocean near a sea current, or the canal is constructed to the same ocean channel.

By an examination of a map of the Gulf States you will observe the number of fresh-water streams which flow into the Gulf opposite the proposed location of the mouth of the canal. Those streams are similar in many respects to other western rivers, continually carrying down to the sea immense alluvial deposits and drift that, coming into contact with no sea current, which is a hundred miles south of Mobile, are left to be blown by the prevailing winds in the direction of the canal. I am told that there is a continual piling up and moving of the sand deposit, and for weeks strong winds, almost a gale, are blowing with such fierceness as in all probability will prevent tugs from carrying vessels into the canal. Whatever doubt there may be in regard to an ocean current at or near the South Pass, there is no pretense that it is within many miles of the proposed mouth of the canal. What then is to become of the immense alluvial deposit and drift that annually flow down the fresh-water streams that empty into the Gulf, with no ocean current to bear them seaward, but to settle down, making the approach to the canal more shallow year by year?

Another objection to the canal is the action of the cyclones on the pass and bays, making it useless as a channel of commerce and possibly entirely filling it up with the sand and drift driven over that waste by these terrible tempests. Mr. Henry Dart, while superintendent in the construction of both Forts Jackson and Saint Philip, witnessed the terrible force and power of these cyclones, and gives the following account of their effects:

> September 15, 1855.—Storm from northeast all day. At 6 o'clock p. m. the sea-water had backed 7 feet above the natural surface of the land. Pass mark 6′ + 3′ = 9 feet above the tide, the total rise of water caused by the storm.
> August 10, 1860.—It stormed all day and night; and on the 11th the wind blew a perfect hurricane, backing up the Gulf water to pass mark 9′ to 12 feet above tide-water, washing away all the front levees, and filling the batteries and ditches with logs and drift.
> September 15, 1860, (a month and five days later in the same year.)—We had another hurricane, backing up the Gulf water 11 feet 6 inches above the tide-level, filling the batteries and ditches as before with drift. * * * It often happens that the land is covered by sea-water from a continuance of northeast winds.

Bear in mind that the canal proposed is to be at or near Fort Saint Philip, the ditches of which were filled with logs and drift. Suppose the canal finished, with its walls and ditch ready to catch the logs, drift, and sand, driven over this waste by the winds of a tempest, with no current to dredge out and carry off the obstructions. At the recurrence of each of these storms the canal would be buried and would be undergoing the continual process of being dug or dredged out by artificial means, of course rendering it useless for all commercial purposes. We must remember that the dredging process at the mouth of the river, which has given partial relief, would be entirely dispensed with, leaving us with no outlet. If the canal should be rendered unfit for use by one of these storms, to the prostration and ruin of all trade into and out of the Mississippi River; if an accident of this kind is possible, it is such an objection to the canal that it should not be thought of unless it is the last desperate expedient, and all the science of engineering is exhausted to demonstrate to the world that the mouth of the river defies human skill, and cannot be utilized and made subservient to the necessities of commerce.

Another paramount objection is that a canal must utterly fail to meet the demands of the ever-increasing commerce of the great undeveloped interior, which must in the nature of things go on to higher and higher degrees of development until a commerce will pass down this river on its way to the sea for distribution to foreign countries of which we cannot have a real conception. The Mississippi Valley is now filled with a population approximating to twenty millions, and will at no distant day, according to the ratio of increase which has marked the past, be two hundred millions. Who doubts this when we consider the great fertility of its soil and its adaptability to the cultivation of the products of all countries; its vast mineral resources, absolutely mountains of metals the most useful and valuable in the arts and industries of the world, with thousands of square miles of coal underlying its surface ready to be utilized in their manufacture—who doubts, I say, that it will some day be an industrious bee-hive swarming with the most intelligent and enterprising population on the face of the globe; every acre of its rich soil in a high state of cultivation; every mineral mined and manufactured, and all its millions upon millions of tons of products prepared for market by two hundred millions of people?

With this area now only sparsely settled—just dotted here and there with a farmer's hamlet—and vast regions yet unsubdued to the dominion of the plowshare, the present railroad system, although it is our pride and the wonder of the world, is utterly incapable of meeting its transportation necessities, and you tell us that a little canal is to receive into and pass out to the open sea the grand fleet that is to be gathered on the bosom of the Father of Waters from its tributaries of Red River, Arkansas, Yazoo, Tennessee, Cumberland, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, saying nothing about the foreign commerce that will be attracted from tropical America and the Old World to exchange for our productions and manufactures! In the apt words of Professor Fontaine:

> When I view the mighty subject as it really is, the idea of neglecting its natural orifice, and attempting to supply its commercial wants with a little canal, is to my mind as absurd as an effort would be to feed a vigorous and voracious man by closing his mouth and cutting a hole in his neck and poking food into his stomach with a spoon.

With all these facts plain to the common apprehension, it is strange indeed that we should be willing to let this opportunity pass to open the mouth of the river, or, if you prefer it, try the experiment, when that experiment is to be made at the expense of those bold and daring men of genius who have spent their lives in watching the currents of the river and studying the wants of the West. Are not these men, with their distinguished chief, who combines more actual practical knowledge with great scientific attainments than any other man in America, entitled to a consideration in solving this problem due no other men? Grant that our Government engineers have received more finished educations; unless it is applied with a practical knowledge of this river and its phenomena all their calculations must be mere theories, based on conjectured facts of which they know nothing except in the abstract.

It is common sense to believe that an intelligent man who has spent an active life toiling with the Mississippi, whose means of living has been wrenched from its reluctant grasp, who has been as familiar with its waves, eddies, and currents from his young manhood as the field to the husbandman, always delving, always searching with the critical eye of a lover of science, his natural genius burnished with patient and laborious study of the science of engineering, all directed during a long life in one channel, and that channel the Mississippi River—what jury of his peers would not give greater weight to Captain Eads as an expert in the case now under consideration than to all the graduate scientists of schools, whose opinions are made up from less practical knowledge than is possessed by the rude and unlettered who float on its bosom?

But he is supported in his theories of jetties by some of the educated and renowned engineers of our own and foreign countries. Nor is he without evidence of the accomplishment of similar enterprises when failure was foretold by an educated board of engineers. Sir Charles Hartley, when he advanced the idea of opening the mouth of the Danube by jetties, was regarded in scientific circles as little better than an enthusiast; and a board of engineers, sitting as a jury on his enterprise, declared that it would not accomplish the object, and the government was recommended not to sink its millions in the wild undertaking of confining the currents of a great river within walls, so as to make it dig the necessary canal that the commerce of interior Europe might find an outlet at the mouth of a river very similar to the Mississippi. The accomplished success of the jetty system at the mouth of the Danube is a monument to the skill of Hartley as well as to the short-sighted condemnation of the enterprise by an educated board of engineers.

I do not mean to undervalue the ability of our Government engineers, but they must have an actual experience of that which is to be investigated before they can pronounce the infallible opinion of failure. This is the experience which Captain Eads possesses, and upon which he and his friends are willing to stake their fortunes, only asking the Government to pay them when they have demonstrated that the channel of the Mississippi can be made and maintained. The failure of the enterprise would be a terrible misfortune to those who spend their money, but it would be a gain to the Government by demonstrating that some other plan must be devised for the relief of the commerce of the country. It therefore seems to me to be past comprehension why this Congress can object to these gentlemen spending their own money in securing an object all devoutly wish. especially when this cannot militate against any other plan to be tried hereafter.

The only real objection I have heard urged against it is that Captain Eads when he fails will then come begging to Congress for renumeration to which he will not be entitled under his contract. In conclusion, let me intreat you to do a tardy act of justice to the suffering West and South. Many years we have labored and contributed to prosper other sections; we now come before you asking that we be paid back in some measure for all these years of toil, by giving a cheap and free outlet to sea to the millions of industrious agriculturists whose farms are washed by the Mississippi and its taibutaries. They demand that a portion of the millions they have paid into the Treasury shall be contributed in their behalf.

In this connection we ask you to consider the mighty population that is to inhabit this valley at no distant day.

Patrick Henry, in 1788, had a prophetic vision of the great West, when most of it belonged to a foreign country and was a wilderness. He said:

> I clearly foresee that the power of America will be seated in the valley of this great and inestimable river.

We now feel that the scepter of empire will soon be in our grasp which is to control the destinies of this country in the ages yet to come, and you will be suppliants at our feet asking, as we are asking now, for justice. If you would not have us turn a deaf ear to your pleadings, show your generosity and statesmanship by listening to the wants and demands of this people. We have sat still a long time feeling the gnawing hunger of our wants, while you have grown rich and prosperous. Help us to bridle our great river and utilize its energies and power for the development of a grand civilization that beckons us from the near future, and it will be our pleasure in the day of our empire and glory to point to the smoking steamers that fill our great river, bearing away to other countries the products of the multiplying millions of people that inhabit its shores, as the result of the combined wisdom, statesmanship, and patriotism of a common country.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I have no prepared speech, butI propose to advocate in a few brief remarks, suggested by the occasion, the plan proposed by Mr. Eads for clearing out the Mississippi River. I do not live on the Mississippi River or in the great valley of the Mississippi. I do not know Captain Eads beyond a mere casual acquaintance; nor, sir, have I that knowledge which I presume but few members of the House have of the Mississippi River—its currents, its depth, its capacity, its changes, its overflow—which would render me qualified to render a judgment upon this question. But, sir, that river has been surveyed by intelligent engineers, some educated at West Point and some educated elsewhere. They have explored it, studied it, examined it, and they have come to different conclusionsin reference to its improvement.

I am in favor of this proposition, first, because it proposes to cost the Government nothing; and secondly, because it proposes within a short period of time to render available to us the mighty resources and capacity of that great stream which traverses our country for thousands and thousands of miles. I shall be prepared further, if this project shall fail and I am here, to vote whatever else may be necessary to adopt any other scheme that any intelligent corps of engineers appointed by the Government or selected otherwise may deem necessary to open up the mouth of this river and make it available to the commerce of the country. To-day it is almost useless and valueless to us. I have seen, as other gentlemen upon this floor have seen, within the last twelve months, foreign ships and ships of our own stranded in the mud at the mouth of this river laden with valuable cargoes amounting to thousands and millions of dollars in valne, unable to move for weeks and months.

One of the great objects of the war that was prosecuted against the South was to control and preserve the free navigation of the Mississippi River. Yet that river is to-day almost valueless to this Government, as a united government, as much so as it would be in the hands of the confederate government. I do not live upon the Mississippi, as I have said, nor do I live in that great valley, nor do I know Captain Eads. But I live in a portion of the country which is identified and connected with the great West in its enterprises, its energies, and its vast resources.

I have here a report made by one of the committees of this House showing that during the war $80,000,000 worth of cotton was destroyed in New Orleans. It shows further that after the war $26,000,000 worth of cotton was seized in southern ports and the proceeds turned over to the Treasury of the United States. There have been exacted from the South and West in the way of cotton taxes $68,000,000. In regard to this single item of cotton alone, not taking into account the provisions and supplies which were taken, nor the depreciation of our lands and the destruction of our homes, simply referring to this isolated article of cotton alone, one can see the ruin and destruction which wasted and consumed our country at the close of the war. This left our people so utterly unable to provide levees and build dikes to protect their homes from overflow, that at this session of Congress we have been called upon to vote $200,000 to keep the people there from absolute starvation—a thing unknown and unheard of before in the history of this country prior to the war.

These are the considerations which control and influence me to support the proposition made by Captain Eads to open the mouth of the Mississippi River and give the people of the West and the South who live upon that river and its tributaries an outlet to the ocean and the commerce of the world, and intercourse with those who live east of them along upon our coast and our shores. It is a proposition which commends itself to the patriotism and the intelligent consideration of every man in this House and of the whole country, and cannot be properly and legitimately ignored.

It will not do for men who have never seen that mighty stream, flowing as it does for thousands of miles through our entire country, to say that they understand it, and that this and that thing cannot be done. That is all nonsense; that is the extreme of folly. It is not proper for men to assume upon their own knowledge of that stream to say whether this or that project will be successful.

For myself, I propose to depend upon the information given us by intelligent engineers, who have examined the Mississippi River, who have surveyed it, and who have computed its velocity, its depth, and its capacity. I have read, so far as I have been able to get hold of it, everything that has been written and published upon this subject, every article ever written upon it by every officer, whether of the Government or not, and I have this to say: whatever argument can be urged against this jetty system can be urged with equal force and propriety against any canal project which may be proposed. These plans are alike objectionable in some respects. If jetties cannot be constructed so as to make this river available, neither can a canal be dug from Saint Philip's to the Gulf that will fully answer the purpose. All of these projects are objectionable, liable to the same physical difficulties.

Mr. ATKINS. Why?

Mr. COOK. Just because they are. Whatever difficulties present themselves in regard to the jetty project also present themselves in connection with the project of a canal, and necessarily so. The canal will be dug upon the same soil upon which the jetties must be constructed, and whatever will throw up and displace the jetties will throw up and destroy the bottom of the canal when it shall be constructed. The canal will be built upon the same kind of soil with the jetties, upon the same formation, and subject to precisely the very same changes and the same physical difficulties the one with the other.

I am in favor of this jetty project of Captain Eads, because it proposes to cost the Government nothing should it not prove successful. If it fails, then he must bear the loss. If it shall succeed and the country shall be benefited by it, then he should be paid for it. If you adopt the other project and it fails, then the Government will be the loser and must pay the bill, and it will be years and years before it can be accomplished.

Sir, the time has come in the history of this country when the mighty, powerful, and growing interests of the western and southern country, those who people the country of the vast Mississippi River and its tributaries, must be consulted and considered in the action of this Government. The time has come when the East and the North, that have had the control of the commerce and banking facilities of this country, must yield to the interests and necessities of that mighty people who at no distant day are to control the Government.

These are the considerations and views which prompt me to support this measure and to challenge for it the earnest, honest, cordial support and co-operation of every man who feels any degree of interest in the prosperity of the South and the West. There are those who do not feel that interest, so far as the South is concerned, which I would be glad to see manifested. We have seen the evidence of that to-day; and I have felt saddened at the spectacle which we have witnessed here of rejecting a proposition proposing to give to the poor unfortunate people in our country, who claim to be loyal, a pittance for the rent of their houses and lands, their homes, from which they were driven after the surrender of their armies, after peace was proclaimed by your President and all the authorities of this country. The proposition to give them a mere pittance of compensation was voted down to-day in this House; and, sir, it saddened my heart. I felt it deeply; I feel it now. The time will come when men who voted against it may feel regret at their action.

We heard the other day from a gentleman from Iowa that during the war the pendulum swung backward and forward and sometimes went far away from the Constitution. We have heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] say that he would not now undertake to defend many acts which were passed during the war. We have heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] say that there are States, States with rights; that there is a Constitution, and that there are limitations in that Constitution. All these things are deeply gratifying to me, showing a returning sense of justice and right among the people of this country. And when the passions and bitterness engendered by the war shall have subsided, I believe this country will do ample and complete justice to those who surrendered in good faith, who laid down their arms, and who are now utterly impoverished and ruined by the results of the war.

I was not one of those who were in favor of the war. For myself I opposed it. But when the war came, living where I did, born where I was, and where my ancestors had lived for generations and mingled their dust with its soil, I had no alternative but to assume the position I did. But, sir, when we surrendered, no people upon the face of the earth ever laid down their arms in better faith than did the southern people; and from that day to this they have been content with their lot. All they ask is simple justice from this Government.

More money has been appropriated to clean out the little rivers and streams and by-ways in the North and East, in which you could scarcely float a bateau, than has ever been appropriated to the South and West. Turn over your records; examine the appropriations made year after year since the organization of this Government down to the present day, and see who have paid the taxes of this country and who have received the benefit of them. Millions and millions have been appropriated to the East to clear out the smallest streams, while the people in the mighty West and South, in Arkansas, in Louisiana, in Mississippi, and in Tennessee and Georgia, have been left to carry on for themselves such internal improvements as they needed, until they have been utterly impoverished and ruined.

Now, when it is proposed to open the mouth of the great Mississippi River, when a man comes forward and asks to be permitted to do this work upon the assurance that the Government shall be subjected to no loss in the event of his failure, we are told it cannot succeed. Who tells us this? Who are the men that denounce this project? Are they those interested in the development of that section and the prosperity of the people, or are they those interested in other and counter projects? Are they those who seek the benefit of the toiling millions living along that river and the mighty streams connected with it? Or are they those who seek and expect to live upon the bounty and contribution which the Government may make year after year for the next ten or fifteen years to carry out this project?

As I have said, I am in favor of this project, because it proposes to charge the Government nothing if it fails; and it proposes to do the work at once. No man ever made a fairer proposition. You have heard the history of the man who makes this proposition. I have met him and know him casually. I have stood upon the great bridge built by him across the Mississippi, and I have contemplated with astonishment the enterprise and genius that constructed it. A man with capacity to accomplish such a work as that can do almost anything else that he proposes to do. I say that this proposition made by him commends itself to the earnest, honest, intelligent consideration and co-operation of every man in this country who seeks its common benefit and general interest.

Some may say that this project is sectional; that the work is to be constructed down there among disloyal people who have been arrayed in arms against the Government. That has nothing to do with this proposition. Open up the mouth of that river; make it available and valuable to the commerce of this country and the commerce of the world; relieve it from the obstructions which nature seems to have thrown in its path—obstructions, however, which in other places have been so often and so constantly overcome by the power and might of genius. Do that, and the people of that section will feel that there is on the part of Congress a returning sense of justice—a recognition of the rights of the people of the West and South by this Government which should be, and ultimately must be, recognized.

IMPORTATION OF CHINESE COOLIES.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I trust I am not insensible to the importance of the question which has been under discussion this evening. The project for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi has my entire and hearty approval, and will receive my vote when it is matured and submitted to the action of the House. But I rise to speak upon another subject.

IMPORTATION OF CHINESE COOLIES.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to premise what I have to say upon the question on which I am now about to detain the House for a few moments, for fear my remarks might be open to misconstruction, by saying at the outset that I do not share in the sentiments of that class who entertain prejudice against any people on account of race or color, but have ever been, and hope I may ever be, willing at all times and under all circumstances to accord to every people, of whatever nationality or color, the equal protection of the laws. And, sir, I trust I have been, and am now, in full accord with the liberal sentiments of the party to which I belong, and with which I have acted for the last fourteen years. While I do not claim to represent any political party in the views I now express here, yet I do claim to represent men of both parties and the interest of the laboring class of my State and the Pacific coast. I do believe that this Government has the right and ought to exercise it to prevent the immigration of any class of people to this country whose moral and social relations, whose habits and mode of life, are so at variance with the genius of our institutions, that they would cause the blush of shame to mantle the cheek of the most depraved of our own race; who bring their women here as slaves to be sold into prostitution, and who openly flaunt their immoral calling on the public streets in the very face of our wives and daughters; whose corrupting influence on the youth of the country is to be regarded with horror; in fact, whose blighting influence is felt and seen on every hand. This people breed a moral pestilence wherever they go, the increase of which is daily multiplying upon us with all of its evils, and yet in the very face of all these facts we are told we are powerless to remedy this evil; that its blighting curse is to be continued because we have a treaty. Then, I say, repeal the treaty. But, say some, "We must have commercial relations with them, and to have this we must submit to the conditions imposed in this treaty." What would you think if the municipal authorities of a great city like New York should permit a ship to land at its wharves when the passengers on board were infected with a loathsome and contagious disease, thereby causing the contagion to spread over the city, and subject its inmates to a fearful disease and death? Your laws prevent it. Humanity prevents it. Your good sense revolts at such a policy. The ship is immediately sent into quarantine with all its passengers on board. Yet you would let your steamships land with a people whose very presence is disease and death, moral and physical.

Experience of more than twenty years has taught us that those of the Chinese who come here, voluntarily or otherwise, do not assimilate with us in one single particular; that a resident of so many years among a people who are inferior to none on earth in morality, virtue, and intelligence, whose halls of learning, and houses of worship are the pride of the country, has failed entirely to redeem them. Like Ephraim, they are wedded to their idols. But say some of my philanthropic friends, they are a poor, degraded people it is true, yet we should try and benefit them by our example and Christian teachings. To that I reply, do all for them you can in their own country, but do not bring them here to try the experiment. What would the gentlemen who favor a high protective tariff think if these Chinese should take the place of the thousands of women and girls who are now employed in the Middle and New England States, and thereby throw out of employment thousands of this class who depend upon their daily toil for a subsistence? There would go up such a demand to Congress for legislation upon this subject as has never been heard before. It is claimed, sir, that free trade would have a tendency to close down the various manufactories of the country, and that a tariff for their protection is absolutely necessary. Then if this be true, that you desire to protect the laborers, and are not simply trying to protect the wealthy manufacturer, by imposing a tax upon imported articles at the expense of the consumer, then in the name of justice and consistency do something to protect our languishing and starving poor laborers, who have to contend with these Asiatics from whom our people must flee as from a pestilence.

I appeal to the representatives of the people here assembled, whether from the East or West, North or South, who have ever been in sympathy with the toiling masses of the country to do something now to protect those who are entitled to our sympathy and consideration. By doing so you give additional encouragement to a class whom we cordially invite to our shores; who are capable of assuming the duties and responsibilities of American citizenship, who will add something to the wealth and prosperity of the country, and who are attached to its institutions, and who can comprehend something of the blessings of a republican government.

No power of our Government requires the exercise of greater wisdom or discretion than that of treaty making with foreign nations. Not that, upon general principles, there is any difficulty in determining the basis upon which it should be exercised. We must conform to the spirit of our free institutions if we would avoid the just reproach of the whole civilized world. But it is sometimes difficult to determine in what such conformity consists.

The general idea that ours is a land where the people of other nations may find a home; where they may seek refuge from the oppression of their own governments, embodies a sentiment as old as the nation, and I am happy to believe that in acting upon it we have improved the condition of all those people who, from year to year, have come to our shores from the civilized nations of Europe. They have not been disappointed in any promise held out to them by our Government, and we have been satisfied to admit them to all the privileges of American citizenship.

The single element of freedom has thus been exemplified, and the civilized world has been benefited by it. Of nothing, as an American, am I prouder than the grand exhibition of this great cosmopolitan principle. It has added millions to our population, increased by a proportion equal to a third of our settled territory the area of improvement, and given us a standing among nations which is shared by no other people in the world.

The principle has worked well for our country, and doubtless it was upon the supposition that it would continue to do so that we have made the same offers of protection and given the same cordial invitation to the nations of Asia as to those of Europe. We have never paused to consider the difference in the people of the two sections; their habits, their civilization, their culture, their religion. Upon the broad ground that our Government was made for all, Christian and heathen alike, and that the one would as readily conform to it as the other, we have laid no restraints upon immigration, come whence and how it may.

The benefits that we have derived from the growth of our European population have blinded us to the possible dangers of an equal population from Asia. Our complaint has been that they did not come sooner; that we were not at an early period of our history admitted to an unrestricted intercourse, commercially and socially, with the great nations of Japan and China. We have been eager and persistent in our efforts to break down the great social barrier which those nations opposed to all other nations, and to include them in the number of our friends.

I propose, sir, in the remarks which I have to offer in support of this measure, to show that we have made a most unfortunate mistake. If we had paused long enough to reflect upon the great difference which existed in all the elements that enter into the formation of national character between the Chinese and the Americans we should not have committed this great error.

There is not a single point of resemblance between the two nations. China is socially a heathen despotism. Its period of great improvements and great works expired centuries before the Christian era—when the great wall and great canal were built. Since then the empire bears evidence of a slow decay, and civilization has manifested itself in handicraft works of little utility, indicative merely of mechanical skill, pleasing to the eye but without the smallest intellectual significance.

By reason of that national jealousy, which until within the last forty years denied all access to foreigners, an overgrown population of five hundred millions has been trained to a course of life that has absolutely nothing in it to develop the mind or arouse any higher ambition than for a meagre and miserable existence.

This immense multitude, living in the shadow of heathen temples, worshiping images, knows nothing of God, and bows submissively to a government which practices every possible enormity. Woman, when not used as a slave, is something worse. The relations between parent and child are like those of master and slave. The father sells his son into servitude and his daughter for prostitution. If children become too numerous, infants are exposed in every possible manner to death. When a member of a family becomes incurably sick, he is abandoned to his fate, and no one dares to offer him aid, lest by the death on his hands he should thereby incur the guilt and punishment of murder. Criminals are executed with a refinement of cruelty and torture that would shame the savages of our western plains. Polygamy and concubinage are national institutions. Thieving, trickery, cheating, and fraud are taught and encouraged as the essential elements of success in all commercial operations.

Under a system of instruction which embraces all these and a thousand other enormities of kindred character, the Chinese have had all that is good, noble, and refined in their nature crushed out. It is impossible for the best of them to rise above and overcome these multiform obstacles to advancement.

There is no more true progress in nations thus debauched than in the pursuits of a nation of savages.

How is it possible for such a people ever to comprehend the American Government? What is there in their national antecedents of fifty centuries to which they can compare it? In all their wars, in all their rebellions, where can they find an instance in which either party fought for liberty?

In the terrible laws by which they are governed, in their domestic relations, in their trading and commercial intercourse, what can they refer to which will afford the most remote idea of republicanism? What do they know about equality?

And the opportunities for contrast are equally barren when they attempt to comprehend the vastness of our institutions of learning, our forms of religious worship, and our great works of improvement. These are altogether beyond any ideas they are capable of forming for the improvement of their own country. Their mode of life, their food, their dress, their destitution, their homes, all of them belong to a scale of being so much below those of our country that they can form in idea, no conception, of the difference.

With all the difficulties—difficulties as inherent as nature itself—to overcome, the Chinese have, as an insurmountable obstacle to their progress, an ingrained belief taught from their infancy, that theirs is a Celestial Land; that though they may leave it, it must be for a season only; that, though, they die while away from it, their bodies can never rest and their souls never be happy until their bones are returned there for burial. No higher sin can be committed against their deity, or their country than to forswear their allegiance and become the citizens of another nationality.

Sir, if we had reflected upon these familiar facts of Chinese history, we should have known before the Burlingame treaty was formed, that for such a people to come to America in any great numbers, would be to inflict a curse upon our country greater than that of slavery from which we have been so recently delivered.

Unlike the immigrants from other nations, they are entirely destitute of qualifications which can be improved under our institutions. The oppressed people of Ireland, Germany, or any other European nation come here to find homes. They appreciate our liberty in its largest sense, and from the moment they set foot on our soil their condition is improved mentally and morally. They follow our pursuits, worship our God, affiliate with our people, and are not only with us but of us; not so the Chinaman. Remain here as long as he may, he is a stranger, he adheres to the teachings of his boyhood, introduces the habits, dress, and customs of his own people, and does not possess a social element in common with us.

But I do not propose to treat this subject theoretically alone. The experience of Chinese immigration through which we are now passing is of the most startling character, and must be my apology for craving the considerate attention of this House to the subject in some of its most important details.

The Chinese began to immigrate to California soon after the discovery of gold placers in that State, their object being doubtless that of gold mining. More than two thousand were at work in the placers and the mountains before the close of 1852, and since that time they have steadily increased in numbers until their present population is something more than seventy thousand. The single pursuit of gold mining in placers would have suited the early Chinese immigrants better than any other occupation, but such was the rush of people to California for the three or four years after gold was discovered that it was impossible for them profitably to follow it. They were molested by other and stronger adventurers. If they found a placer of any value they were driven from it. If they obtained gold in any considerable quantity it was taken from them by violence. They were obliged to seek other and more menial occupations. They became almost immediately the servants of servants, and were obliged to work hard for pay that would hardly have supported any other class of people. They were entirely destitute of all adaptabilities for any labor above that of menial service. They were employed as cooks, house servants, day laborers, and subjected to coarse treatment and abuse.

This was the first introduction into our country of Chinese cheap labor.

The time was auspicious for its growth and success, for in those days the price of labor in California was very high. Chinamen were employed in preference to whites, because they could do the work as well and at greatly reduced prices. They soon came to be a necessity. There were not enough of them in the country to meet the demands of the people. Then the living tide rolled in. Every vessel that crossed the Pacific was freighted with this population, and the companies formed in China for their immigration increased the facilities for their transportation.

> They came as the winds come when forests are rended,
> They came as the waves come when navies are stranded.

Notwithstanding the opposition of white laborers to this influx, other classes of the community who were benefited by it, favored it, and influenced public opinion to encourage it by every possible means. How far this influence may have operated to produce the different treaties that have been made with China during the past twenty years, it is impossible to determine; but it is quite certain, if there had been no Chinese in the country, there would have been no such treaty made as the one now in operation.

Mr. Speaker, since the commencement of Chinese immigration, California, with a rapidity unequalled in any former history, has grown into one of the most important States in the Union. Oregon has also become a thriving and populous member of the Union, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona have been organized, and each boasts of a large and growing population.

In California, Nevada, and Oregon the competition between Chinese and white labor has grown into an oppression which is steadily driving from the communities white men who seek a livelihood by active daily toil. American labor, hitherto the strong right arm of this Republic, is withering beneath this Asiatic blight. The power which has filled this great country with manufactures, with improvements; which has opened wide the gates of commerce with every other nation; which has made all the actual wealth of the nation, is humiliated before this insidious, far-reaching, and dangerous foe to our institutions. It is coming upon us with the stealth of a "thief in the night;" like the dark speck upon the horizon which heralds a storm; it is growing in blackness, gathering in intensity, and threatens to discharge its pent-up artillery upon our devoted land.

Sir, if there be an element of success which more than another has given us consideration abroad and security and happiness at home, it is the encouragement we have always given to labor. No nobler or more intelligent, more honest, more loyal people exist on earth than the great laboring class of the United States.

The scriptural axiom that "the laborer is worthy of his hire" has been dignified in every pursuit of life in our country. In those nations where labor is deprecated there is little intelligence or loyalty outside of the wealthy classes.

The poor mechanic who in England worked hard for his sixpence per day comes to this country, and on his dollar or two per day lives comfortably, supplies his home with every necessary, educates his children, and enjoys all the advantages of social life.

The oppressed Irishman, driven from his hovel in his own country, with his mattock and pick earns a speedy competency here, with no fear of the heavy hand which crushed him to the dust at home.

American labor has elevated the people of every civilized nation who have sought a home under our free Constitution. Both nation and people have been alike benefited by it. It has thrived better than any other single element of our greatness. In our darkest hours, when the Union was threatened with disruption, when calamity visited every other source of prosperity, labor remained intact. It was always in demand, it always met its reward, it always added its quota to the growth and greatness of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, the rights of the laborer are threatened with invasion. I would not say that the immigration of seventy-five thousand Chinamen to our country, in and of itself, was an evil of which we could not in time free ourselves. It is the beginning only of a great calamity; how great, let us try to realize in the light of facts unless it is speedily arrested. Of the number of Chinese immigrants there are now twenty-five thousand in the city of San Francisco. That city boasts in all a population of two hundred thousand, one-eighth of which are Chinese. Let us see how greatly the cause of labor there is affected by them. The business of manufacturing cigars is exclusively theirs. They are employed in forty large cigar manufacturies and an indefinite number of smaller ones. Seventy-eight clothing factories, including three shirt factories, employ Chinese only. Ten boot and shoe factories, and twenty-five slipper factories, give employment to Chinese workmen, one of which keeps one hundred constantly at work. In six tin shops Chinese are employed; then there are watchmakers, jewelers, and Chinese doctors who follow their pursuits independently.

In the various factories of the city there are ten thousand Chinese employed, who for less than half the ordinary wages of white mechanics perform an equal amount of labor. Their labor embraces nearly all the local industries of the city. White mechanics in search of employment are met by Mongolians who are willing to work for prices which will not support the white man.

Many of them engage in small manufactures of their own on a scale which would shame a white laborer, and by means of which articles are afforded at prices so greatly reduced as to defy competition by white labor. Hundreds of them are employed as house servants, because their services can be obtained at one-half that of a white woman.

It is claimed by the advocates of Chinese labor that whatever cheapens labor produces a corresponding reduction in price, and that one dollar is thus made to go as far as two under the old system. However plausible this may seem in theory it is not true in fact, especially is it not so with reference to this class of labor. If it were then as the demand for this kind of labor increased the reduction in price of production would still preserve the same distinction between Chinese and white labor, and when a white laborer could be employed at the present prices paid to Chinese, the latter by reason of this reduction could be employed at one half those rates.

But to make this rule operate equally upon the capitalist and the laborer, it must have a general application, and all sorts of labor must be reduced to the same standard. This would drag labor down to the European standard, a result certainly no lover of American institutions would desire to see.

Labor, sir, would thus be so degraded that all white labor would be driven from the field of competition, and the thousands who now annually come to our country from Europe to improve their condition would do equally well to remain at home.

The demand would be limited to Chinese labor, and in place of the intelligent, progressive population that now comes to our country, we would be overrun by a swarm of heathen Mongolians.

It is not true, however, that the low price paid the Chinaman causes a low price in the products of his labor. It is the capitalist who makes by the change. He realizes now, whatever he may do hereafter, as much for his wares as if they were manufactured by the white man, and he must continue to do so until white labor succumbs to his demands, or is destroyed altogether. There never has been an element introduced into our country which, both now and prospectively, will operate so oppressively upon all kinds of free labor as this Chinese competition.

There is another consideration to be viewed in this connection. The reward which the Mongolian receives for his labor is of little or no value to our country. Small as it is it all eventually goes to China. Even the small portion of it spent for food and clothing goes into the pockets of Chinese dealers, who, beyond a very few of the necessaries of life, purchase all their merchandise in the Celestial land.

Look at the figures. Say that twenty-three thousand Chinamen in San Francisco average for their labor one dollar per day. That amounts to $8,395,000 annually, which is withdrawn from white labor. It is reasonable to suppose that the same number of white men would realize two dollars per day or an annual amount of $16,790,000. The Chinaman sends his money to China, the white laborer spends his here. It enters all the avenues of trade. What would such an addition to the money expenditure of San Francisco do for the city? Would not commerce and trade be correspondingly enlarged and the city be increased in its local wealth and improvement?

Look at the subject in its more enlarged sense. The 125,000 Chinamen in the country annually send to China the enormous sum of $45,625,000. But for their presence in the country $91,250,000 would be thrown into circulation by white laborers who are excluded from work.

This is the manner in which the employment of Chinese labor operates against the Pacific States and Territories. An amount is annually sent away from them sufficient to supply them with all the great works of internal improvement necessary for their full development.

Besides the cheap living of the Chinese in our country, which enables them to work for low wages, the clothing and household accommodations which they require are such as the people of no civilized nationality could endure. A suit that will serve a Chinaman for six months he can purchase from his countrymen for six dollars. Nine dollars a month will board, clothe, and lodge. In some of the buildings occupied by them in San Francisco, by means of berths fastened to the wall less than three feet asunder, a thousand or more are lodged. They live in the cellars, among the reeking fumes of opium and rancid grease, which is used as a delicacy in Chinese cookery.

The total value of the personal and real property owned by a population of twenty-five thousand in the heart of the great city of San Francisco, is less than $600,000, on which they pay an annual tax of $8,229.50, a sum insufficient to pay the salaries of one-half the policemen stationed in the Chinese quarter alone. The rents in that portion of the city occupied by Chinese are from 50 to 75 per cent. lower than the rent of buildings in other quarters not as favorably located for business purposes.

That such a population should be permitted under the sanction of law to crowd thousands of our own mechanics out of employ, monopolize the trade in the five great Asiatic staples of tea, rice, silk, opium, and tobacco, and fill places that would afford occupation for four thousand idle boys and three thousand poor men, women, and girls who need them, is one of the most extraordinary spectacles of our times.

Sir, this is not all. The Chinese are equally incapable of instruction in our politics and religion. They have erected the idols of their worship among us, and practice here the most senseless and undemonstrative idolatry known to heathen nations. Their religion is a license for the grossest immorality. Vice, in its most hideous form, is the only social element in which both sexes participate. More than two thousand Chinese women, who have never known any other occupation than that of prostitution, reside in the city of San Francisco. They perform no labor. Their knowledge is less than that of the brute creation. They are bought and sold like cattle, and hired out to the basest purposes like horses for livery. This guilty commerce is carried on in the heart of a great city within the observation of thousands of its inhabitants.

Mr. Speaker, I have already, as I think, demonstrated that the Chinese are incapable of conforming in their habits, their customs, their religion to our institutions. They belong to a race entirely distinct from any on this continent. They are regarded by all classes of our society with great abhorrence. The intelligent portion of our population can see nothing but disaster and calamity to all the great interests of the country which they by their peculiar mode of life are enabled through competition to monopolize.

All landed and railroad monopolies sink into insignificance in comparison with the monopoly which this one source will bring upon our country unless it is checked.

It is increasing upon us with alarming rapidity. In 1860 the number of Chinese in the State of California was, according to the census, 34,933. Up to 1870 they increased nearly 50 per cent., their number the latter year being 49,310. During the two years succeeding 1870 the Chinese steamers have not brought less than 12,000, and since the commencement of 1873 there have been 15,000 more added to this number.

The annual immigration with the increase of facilities for transportation will average forty thousand for the next five years, probably twice that for the five years succeeding. In less than ten years this will make the population of the State more than half Chinese.

But they will not be confined to California alone. Already they have found their way over the Rocky Mountains and into the workshops of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. And when we consider that China can spare untold millions of this lowest of their population we may well inquire where is this thing to end?

These people are mere slaves at home, how can they be bettered in their condition by coming here? If China can spare them, is anxious to get rid of them, and is improved in its condition by their leaving there, what can we expect will be the effect of such a debased and groveling race in this country?

No other country in the world than China would be willing for its people to go from a condition where they enjoyed all the liberty that their government permitted to a condition which must become absolute servitude.

Sir, the condition of the slaves in the South was never so devoid of the elements of civilization as that of the Chinese in this country to-day.

Slavery of the worst kind must become the unavoidable condition of those Chinese who come here, and they will be more essentially the cause of it than our people. They cannot rise to the condition of freemen in the sense of the American citizen. Of course, as the predominating race must rule, when men clash in all those radical elements which enter into life the Chinese are slaves from the moment they touch our soil. Our freedom is worth nothing to them.

If they were crushed before they came here they are more entirely under the heel of a public opinion which hates them here, and which will ever prevent their advancement from a condition in comparison to which African slavery was a paradise. They come here as slaves to the companies which pay their passage. This amount they are obliged to pay the companies in such labor as they may find for them to do before they can engage in business for themselves. This very serfdom places them entirely within the control of the company whose bidding they must do until their passage-money is paid. Think of forty thousand of these slaves—double slaves—slaves in the first place to their own people, and then to the prejudice of the American people, landing upon our shores every year to compete with our free citizens for American labor!

Sir, can there be any greater disgrace brought upon the American name? Does the great national idea that ours is a land where the oppressed of all nations may find a home derive any dignity from such a contemplation? Shall we jeopardize the freedom, happiness, and prosperity of our country, out of false respect for a sentiment which is itself destroyed in the experiment? There is no liberty, there is no republicanism in such a course.

Our institutions are in danger. There is but one remedy that I can perceive, and that is to arrest this immigration by treaty.

If we cannot do it altogether, let us at least restrict it, and confine it to a different class. There is no reciprocity in it. Our people do not wish to emigrate to China. The immigration of Chinese here is not necessary to our commercial relations. They are entirely independent of them. They come here from no desire to escape the oppression of their own country. Their whole enterprise is conducted as a mere matter of dollars and cents on the part of those who send them. They make no sacrifices. They are governed by no progressive impulses. Mere machines, they place themselves directly in the way of our own progress, and are so many clogs upon the advancement of our civilization.

There is nothing in their condition to commend them to the sympathy, nothing in their intellectuality to commend them to the respect of the American people. Why, then, when the evil is growing upon us with such fearful rapidity, should we not check it while it is controllable? Every year increases the difficulty. New complications are constantly forming to cumber it with multiplied embarrassments.

The Chinese are constitutionally and by race an inferior people to any of the nations of Europe. Their moral obliquity is such that they can give no reason why they should not bring their women here for prostitution, and erect their joss houses, and practice their heathenism in our very midst. With them these abominations are simple nature, and our free principles and progressive institutions are in their eyes monstrous infringements upon the ideas with which they have been educated.

In no view that we can take of the subject does it appear to us other than the greatest evil of the day. Other monopolies may be arrested by law; but here is an evil which if not now arrested must in a few years become entirely uncontrollable, which will annihilate the rights, the dignity, the character of American labor.

Sir, let me entreat that this session of Congress may not close without at least giving it full and careful consideration.

On motion by Mr. PRATT, it was

THE PENSION LAWS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2453) to amend an act entitled "Act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PRATT, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. HAMILTON of Texas.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of Abraham Ellis, late a first lieutenant, acting as quartermaster and commissary, praying to be allowed a pension. Among other muniments of title to the relief he asks, he transmits a bullet with which he was shot by Quantrell, and several pieces of skull taken from the wound. I move that the petition, the bullet, and the bones be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Joseph H. Maddox, praying compensation for tobacco taken or destroyed by the United States authorities; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the memorial of James J. Robbins, president of the Dardanelles and the Leviathan Mining Companies, I suppose of the State of Nebraska, asking some legislation and protection against other mining companies, and I believe in favor of the Sutro Tunnel Company. The memorial is long, but I believe that is the substance of it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as it relates to a bill which is before that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the petition of Demitry Mindeleff, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for compensation for a very important discovery which he alleges to have made in the preparation of gold and silver. But for the extraordinary statements contained in this paper I should have no question in presenting it. I consider it my duty to do so, as it is respectful in terms, although it seems to me the facts alleged are stated very broadly. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of manufacturers of plug, fine-cut chewing, and smoking tobacco and cigars, and dealers in leaf and manufactured tobacco, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed change in the tax on tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARVEY presented the petition of James Streeter, of Junction City, Kansas, praying compensation for a foundery and other property taken for the use of the Army at Memphis, Tennessee, during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the opening of Wight street through the grounds of the United States Marine Hospital at Detroit, Michigan, was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There being no objection, the vote was reconsidered, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3582) to provide for stamping unstamped instruments, documents, or papers, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement, a bill covering the same subject having been already reported; which was agreed to.

Mr. CONOVER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 853) granting an increase of pension to Esther M. Shubrick, widow of Edward M. Shubrick, deceased, late captain United States Navy, reported adversely thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish the bill to be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3015) granting a pension to Margaret A. Chantry, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Finance have instructed me to report back a resolution calling for a statement of balances due by disbursing officers, the names of delinquents, the States from which appointed, what steps have been taken to enforce their payment, together with the amendment to the same offered by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] with a recommendation that it ought not to pass, and the committee ask to be discharged from its further consideration. I will state that we make this report for the reason that on referring the matter to the Secretary of the Treasury, we received the reply from him that it would take from three to six months to prepare the information called for in the resolution and amendment, and involve an expense of at least $75,000, besides embarrassing them in the disposition of their current force.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to hear what resolution that is.

Mr. SCOTT. It is a resolution the title of which I gave, offered by the Senator from West Virginia, with an amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the resolution will not be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 748) to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stocks and evidences of indebtedness due and held in trust by the Secretary of the Interior on account of the Creek orphan fund, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Lehr Schooler, widow of Richard Schooler, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying an amendment of the act of February 14, 1871, granting pensions to soldiers of that war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Jacob M. Smalley, reported adversely thereon, the petitioner being entitled to relief under a general law; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. Mr. EDMUNDS. The words "the act of July, 1862, and" ought to have been stricken out there. We only remove the constitutional disabilities. That was something that was slipped in that was not observed by the committee. I move to amend by striking out those words.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed by a two-thirds vote.

INDIANS OF NORTHERN SUPERINTENDENCY.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I gave notice some days ago that I would to-day call up the bill (S. No. 154) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency," approved June 10, 1872. I ask that it may be now considered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not object to taking up that bill particularly, but I think it is proper that I should make an effort to call up the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to Mr. Sykes. It is a matter that ought to be disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will say to the Senator that this is a bill of great importance to several tribes of Indians.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Will it take long?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think not.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Then I will try to call up the resolution I have just indicated, as soon as this is through.

Mr. KELLY. I gave notice on Friday last that this morning as soon as the morning business was closed I should ask for the consideration of a bill in which the State of Oregon is deeply interested. I mean the bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge. As soon as the morning business is disposed of, I shall insist on presenting it for the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 154) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency," approved June 10, 1872.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have this bill explained by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I should like to hear the act read to which this purports to be a supplement in order that we may understand what it is we are asked to do.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator has the act before him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot read it if I have.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Send it up to the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Secretary read the act to which this is supplemental, so that we may understand the subject if possible.

The Chief Clerk read the first section of the act of June 10, 1872, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That with the consent and concurrence of the Omaha tribe of Indians, expressed in open council in the usual manner, the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to cause to be surveyed, if necessary, a portion of their reservation in the State of Nebraska, not exceeding fifty thousand acres, to be taken from the western part thereof and to be separated from the remaining portion of said reservation by a line running along the section lines from north to south. The said lands so separated shall be appraised by three competent commissioners, one of whom shall be selected by said Omaha tribe of Indians in open council, and the other two shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. After the survey and appraisement of said lands, as herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and hereby is, authorized to offer the same for sale for cash in hand; and sealed proposals, duly invited by public advertisements, shall be received for the same for tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres each, and also for the entire body offered; and he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to accept the proposal for the entire tract, or the highest bids for separate tracts, whichever shall be deemed best for the interests of the Indians: Provided, That no bid for separate tracts shall be accepted which may be less than the appraised value of such tract, nor less than $1.25 per acre; or for the entire tract which shall be less than the aggregate appraised value of the same, nor less than $1.25 per acre. The proceeds of such sale shall be placed to the credit of said Indians on the books of the Treasury of the United States, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, except such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President of the United States, may deem necessary to be expended for their immediate use in improving and fencing farms, building houses, purchasing implements of agriculture and live stock, and in establishing and supporting schools: Provided also, That not more than 25 per cent. of the principal of the aggregate amount of sales of said lands shall be expended in any one year: Provided, That no sale shall be approved unless the average sales of each of said parcels of said land shall be at least $2.50 per acre.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think the Senator will not require the other sections of the act to be read. They refer to other tribes of Indians, bringing them under the provisions of the first section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do they refer to anything in this bill?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. This bill refers to the same tribes mentioned in the other sections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it does, we ought to hear the other sections read.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The other sections bring each tribe mentioned in each particular section under the provisions of the first section, which has been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the first section covers the whole subject of this bill?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it does, I do not ask to have the other sections read. Then I should like to hear the Senator from Connecticut explain to us, as he undoubtedly can very readily, the scope and object of this bill, and what public interest is to be subserved by its passage.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will state that the act which has just been read provided that with the consent of the other tribes mentioned in the act, their lands might be valued by an appraisal and be sold for cash, and then that the proceeds should be used for the purpose of promoting their civilization. As a matter of fact, very few of the lands have been sold for cash, and therefore the proceeds placed in the Treasury have not been such as to enable the Secretary of the Interior or the President to do much with those funds to promote the civilization of the tribes.

Now, this bill provides that the time of sale shall be extended; that instead of being sold for cash the lands shall be sold payable one-quarter cash and the other three-quarters in one, two, and three years, and that the money thus received shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. It also provides that instead of waiting for that money to be paid, the Treasury shall make an advance for the purpose of aiding in the civilization of these Indians, because their necessities are so great as to demand immediate aid. I do not know that I need make any further statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs; which will be read.

The first amendment of the committee was in section 6, line 7, to strike out "$75,000" and insert "50,000;" so as to read:

For the Omahas, $50,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the effect?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It reduces the amount to be used by the Secretary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All that has been in the appropriation bills, I think. If I shall not intrude in business that does not concern me, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether any provision has been made in the Indian or any other appropriation bill at this session for the Omahas.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not remember. If there has been, it has been very limited.

Mr. WINDOM. There is an appropriation for the Omahas in the Indian appropriation bill, but exactly what I cannot state now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there been any appropriation for the Pawnees, may I ask the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am not able to answer the question.

Mr. WINDOM. There has been.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there been any appropriation for the Otoes and Missourias?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very extraordinary indeed that we had an appropriation bill passed two days ago providing up to the full judgment of Congress for money to be used for the civilization of these Indians, and that now we have a special bill which contains one section with pretty large appropriations for the same purpose, without any limit as to time, without any limit as to the lapsing of the appropriation, or any of the safeguards that stand upon regular appropriation bills. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the subject. No doubt he understands it much better than I do; but prima facie this certainly is not a section that ought to be adopted until we know precisely what we have done and why we have done it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I beg leave to state that quite a number of appropriations were proposed on the Indian appropriation bill which were opposed by the Senator from Vermont; some of them on the ground that they were not proper to go on the appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not oppose any of them.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I beg pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No doubt I should have done so if I had known anything about them.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. There were quite a number of amendments offered which were rejected on the ground that they should be brought up in separate bills, and a large proportion of those appropriations which were recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs were ruled out on that ground and with the advice that we should bring up separate bills, for they were not proper to be put into the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Connecticut is entirely mistaken. I heard the advice given by the Senator in charge of the bill, that was that we should not impose legislation about the Indians upon appropriation bills; but I do not think that the Senator from Minnesota made any objection on the score of its being proper to be brought into some other bill to any item of mere appropriation for the Indians. He certainly could not have done that, and I do not think he did.

The point now under consideration is whether we are to have an appropriation bill such as the sixth section of this bill contains in reference to these Indians, when we have already passed one Indian appropriation bill which makes provision for this class of people. I find in the appropriation bill that we provide for paying the Omahas first, under a treaty, certain installments that we have agreed to pay them, about $22,000, and then there is a general clause for the civilization of the Indians.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Those items are all for treaty stipulations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So they are; but they furnish money to the Indians just the same; and what does the Senator mean the Secretary of the Interior shall do with it? Does he mean that he shall use it for civilization or for rum? That is an important question.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The bill says "for civilization."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good. Then if the provision for these Omahas under the treaty is that the money we give them is to be used for some useful purpose, that of buying the necessaries of life, agricultural implements to improve their lands, you have provided money enough for them by the treaty. That was the object of the treaty, to give them money to be used to improve their condition. Now, in addition to the treaty, the Senator proposes that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall have $50,000 more to use for the benefit of these particular Indians to improve them in civilization, entirely at his discretion, controlled it is true by the direction of the President of the United States; but in this vast country there are so many duties that the President has to perform, that that means that he must rely on subordinate officers for the details of the business.

Now, I want to ask the Senate of the United States if they think it a wise expenditure of public money from the Treasury, when we have already provided thousands upon thousands of dollars for these same Indians, although we have provided a part of that money under a treaty, to now go forward by an additional appropriation to provide fifty or seventy-five thousand dollars more? That is the point; and that is a point which I think, under the present exigencies of the country, the burdens of taxations, in view of the scantiness of cash in the Treasury and the distress of the country, it is well worth praying attention to. There ought to be a very clear and very urgent reason shown to us upon definite statistics why it is that after voting the money we give these Indians under the treaty as well as under the other general provisions that we make in the regular bill for funds in a general way most needed, (as they all contain them I believe,) we are now called upon two days afterward to provide $50,000 more for this particular tribe. I should be glad to hear my honorable friend from Connecticut on that subject.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I certainly can say but few words on the subject. These Indians in the northern superintendency are under the care in one respect of that denomination of Christians called Quakers, and they have been as much interested in and as much devoted to their work as any class of men whom I know. The Secretary of the Interior says they have made no mistakes and have never disappointed him. They represent to the Interior Department very clearly that the situation of those tribes in the northern superintendency is such that an appropriation made now can be used so as to advance them in civilization much more rapidly than if it is delayed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly have read the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and the letter upon which it is based? Let us see what it contains.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have not the Secretary's letter with me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is in reference to the appropriation bill which contains the very money, I suppose.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. There was a letter in connection with this bill. This is an appropriation which if made from the Treasury is to be reimbursed out of the sales of these lands, and therefore it is a temporary loan for the benefit of the Indians. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, that would be very fine for the Indian to sell his land and give him the money and have it used up in a year, and then sell some more land next year, and so on. How long would a civilized farmer get along in supporting his family in that way? Whatever he needs this year he sells land enough off his farm to pay for; next year he sells some more, and so on. Of course he would land in the poor-house in a short time.

I doubt extremely the policy of disposing of these lands of these Indians. We have found that when they have been disposed of, often it has been through some contrivance by which not only the Indian has been plundered out of the value of his lands, but they have fallen into the hands of speculators, so that the disposal of them really did no good to the body of the community near which they lay. I have a case in point directly under my eye, where under the provision of an act of 1872 some Chippewa lands were to be sold, or rather where, under the head of perfecting certain titles, Chippewa lands had been seized really by timber speculators, we provided by law that they might make their titles good on an appraisal; and then we sent out a commission to make an appraisal. It appears on the report of the commission itself, which I will have read when this bill reaches the general discussion, that the average price of land purchased and sold by private parties in that vicinity is about double what they recommend that the United States shall receive from these speculators for the benefit of the Indians. I intend to call the attention of the Senate to it with a view, if this bill is to pass, to provide an amendment which shall cut up that species of plunder, as I am informed from the Interior Department that unless Congress does act the Secretary will feel himself compelled to adopt this report of the appraisers in the face of the circumstance which they return as to what the average value of these lands is, and let the speculators locate in large selected tracts at a price which I say is about half what the price of land in that vicinity is. But I will not open that subject until we dispose of the committee's amendments. The point we are now upon is this appropriation of money, to which I wish to confine what I have to say.

Now I repeat, that in the appropriation bill which I have before me, appropriations for the Omahas, the Pawnees, the Otoes, and the Missourias are contained. I speak of the regular Indian appropriation bill; but there the money appropriated is said to be due under a treaty. Of course if the Indian receives it, it is of just as much benefit to him in respect to furnishing him with the necessaries of life and enabling him to make progress in the arts of civilization, if that is the thing he is to do, as if it were appropriated directly out of the Treasury as a gift. Nobody can question that. The Senator from Connecticut does not question that. I say we have provided for the Omahas about $25,000; we have provided for the Otoes and Missourias $9,000; we have provided for the Pawnees over $50,000 in the appropriation bill, and then we have authorized the Secretary of the Interior "to use for the purpose of civilizing the Pawnees the unexpended balances from funds appropriated for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1873, and former years," going back without limit to the beginning of our Indian operations, and which for aught I know—no doubt the Committee on Appropriations knew when they reported the bill—may cover $1,000,000, but I dare say it does not, because the Committee on Appropriations would have struck it out if it did; but it is unlimited in point of time. It takes all balances of all appropriations of former years "under the provisions of the treaty of September 24, 1857, for the support of mills, schools, &c., the said balances amounting," as the bill says, "to the sum of $8,500." We shall come then, I think, to another clause in the same bill for a sum of money in general to be used by the Secretary of the Interior for improving the condition of the Indians. My friend from Minnesota suggests that what I have now referred to, the general sum given to the Secretary of the Interior for the purposes of civilization, was an amendment proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, giving, as my friend thinks, $40,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I think I am not mistaken in that. Seventy-five thousand dollars was the amount proposed, and it was struck down to $40,000 for general purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then there is another provision, which is in the bill itself, which provides that "a sum not exceeding 33 per cent. of cash annuities herein appropriated at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior shall be expended for the purpose of educating and civilizing the tribes;" and then there is another provision, found on page 87, in the regular Indian appropriation bill:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000 for the support and relief of the Otoe and Missouria tribe of Indians, this amount to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

So, without going further into the details of the bill we have passed, you will find that in every one of the instances which this special bill names we have already made provision by law to the extent that it was then insisted would be necessary, and which was intended by both Houses of Congress to cover the necessary expenditures of the coming fiscal year. Now it is proposed by the sixth section of the pending bill to take out of the Treasury the sum of $125,000 in addition, to be appropriated to these same uses and upon the statement of my friend from Connecticut that the Quakers want it. Then I ask him what evidence have you that the Quakers want it? He hands me a printed letter dated the 23d of December, 1873, addressed by Samuel Janney, on behalf of the executive committee of Friends, relating to the Indians, addressed to the Hon. WILLIAM LOUGHRIDGE, of the House of Representatives. This letter that my friend gives me as coming from the Department does not come from the Department at all. He is probably mistaken in the letter he intended to hand me. By this letter it appears that these gentlemen say that they need funds for the purpose of carrying on the work of civilizing and benefiting these Indians of the northern superintendency. Very well. Then an appropriation bill is brought in for the Indian service, which contains an appropriation of funds for every one of the objects in general demanded by these gentlemen who take this friendly and humane interest in them. No sooner is that passed than the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs proposes to take up another and special appropriation, confided not to the Secretary of the Interior as the general appropriations have been, but to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of $125,000 more. That may be fun for the Quakers; it may be fun for the Indians; but let me tell the Senator from Connecticut that it is not a pleasure to the tax-payers, unless we can have from the responsible head of the Department or from the President of the United States some definite statement which will show that in addition to the sums already appropriated by the regular bill this special appropriation is now necessary; but there is no evidence of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I hope this Indian bill will be brought up to-morrow morning.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the unfinished business is taken up, I give notice that to-morrow, at the conclusion of the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill relative to publishing official documents for sale.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice to the Senate that on account of the sickness of one of our members who cannot be present to-day, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] I have consented to allow the moiety bill, as it is called, to go over until to-morrow; and then I was about to ask the Senate to fix to-morrow instead of to-day for the consideration of that bill. By general consent to-day was fixed for its consideration.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the bill to which I refer will occupy more than half an hour or three-quarters of an hour, and there is some reason why it should be disposed of before the post-office appropriation bill is taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not interfere with my motion, but will allow me to move that the moiety bill, which was set for to-day at one o'clock, be postponed until to-morrow. I will not ask that it be made a special order, because I do not desire to do that at this stage of the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks that the moiety bill, so-called, be considered as the order of business following the expiration of the morning hour to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the Senator will allow half an hour or three-quarters of an hour for the consideration of the bill for the distribution of public documents.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can probably arrange that between ourselves. All I want is simply not to displace the moiety bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to object to that arrangement; but I have already given notice that when the pending resolution is disposed of I shall call up a bill reported by the Special Committee on Transportation. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio if I have the floor, but I object to making a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No special order can be made under the rule. This is simply an understanding, to which the Chair hears no objection.

PORTLAND, DALLES AND SALT LAKE RAILROAD.

Mr. KELLY. Having failed to obtain an opportunity to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill of which I gave notice, I now ask that it be set for Saturday morning after the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge, be considered as the order after the expiration of the morning hour on Saturday next. Is there objection?

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection if it does not displace the bill of which I have given notice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is a particle of use in making such an order; still I have no objection to the Senator having a chance to make his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate does not ordinarily sit on Saturday.

Mr. KELLY. But it may sit next Saturday. I will take the chances.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is no special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No special order, but an urgent request. The Chair hears no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3332) to fix the time for the election of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the State of Mississippi; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 1297) for the relief of Thomas T. Crittenden, of Missouri; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the operations of the shipping commissioners act, approved June 7, 1862.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain;

A bill (S. No. 708) to change the name of the schooner China; and

A bill (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk, and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate instructing the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds to designate upon the Capitol Grounds a site for an equestrian statue of Nathaniel Greene.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. C. B. FARWELL of Illinois, Mr. M. J. DURHAM of Kentucky, and Mr. C. L. MERRIAM of New York, managers at the same on its part.

DELINQUENCIES OF GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that an order be made to print the report and accompanying papers submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] this morning from the Committee on Finance on the resolution concerning delinquencies of Government officers. I make the motion after consultation with him and the chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That J. P. Gillespie be allowed to withdraw his papers in the matter of his claim against the United States upon leaving copies.

I wish to state that there has been an adverse report in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made, copies of the papers being retained.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That Catherine Barry have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That Captain John Graham have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CONOVER, it was Ordered, That James Curtiss and Mrs. E. C. Long have leave to withdraw their petitions and papers from the files of the Senate.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. WINDOM from the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, instructing the Committee on Appropriations to report amendments to the river and harbor bill making appropriations for completing the surveys and estimates for each of the improvements recommended by the select committee upon the four routes indicated in their report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] to amend the resolution by adding the words "and for the Missouri River."

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to a survey of the Missouri River, but I think it should be offered as an amendment to the river and harbor appropriation bill when it comes up. I hope we shall have the judgment of the Senate upon this recommendation of the special committee. I desire to have this amendment voted down for the same reason that other amendments have been.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 3, noes 27; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM. There is evidently a quorum present. Unless we can divide again I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question again to the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, to add the Missouri River as one of the streams to be surveyed.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 5, noes 33.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution as it was amended yesterday.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Mr. President, this resolution is one of very considerable importance. The preamble embraces a great many propositions, and ends with a very small but a most significant resolution, one of such moment that I consider it my duty to express my opinion in regard to it. I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution at length. The Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] followed by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] made the announcement on this floor that this resolution was intended not merely for the purpose of advising the country of the feasibility of the routes indicated as the general condition of the country or of its resources, but that it was intended that the results of that investigation should be pursued; in other words, that it was the inauguration of a great system of internal improvements which was to be pressed upon the country at this time.

Mr. President, I have no question that the engineers will report that these proposed routes are practicable, and that these improvements should be undertaken. Upon that subject I have not a single doubt. The engineers will of course report every route indicated by this committee as practicable. So long as the Corps of Engineers have the use of figures and a Government like that of the United States to back them with money, any route indicated will be practicable to them; and therefore, so far as the intervention of the engineers is concerned, in that respect there can be no trouble. You will have reports from the engineers favorable to all these routes, and many more if they are deemed necessary. In fact, I have no question, considering the engineering capacity of the present age, that canals can be built across the Alleghany Mountains with as much facility as railroads are now built upon the plains.

In my judgment all these schemes are now brought forward with one end in view. To a general system of internal improvements I am altogether opposed. I do think of all the systems to be inaugurated in this country at this day this is one of the worst. We are to commit ourselves to the policy that this Government is to enter into the building of railroads and canals to enter into competition with private enterprises. That is distinctly stated in the preamble of the resolution.

> The Select Committee on Transportation, after full investigation of the subject, report that in their judgment cheap transportation can only be obtained through competition under Governmental control.

That is an idea that will require elaboration when these engineers report upon the feasibility of these routes, that cheap transportation is alone to be obtained under Government control and that by competition. If the Government is to control these works, it must construct them; and I should like to know how the Government in building these works can establish competition. There is but one way known to the people and the Government, and it is by building these roads at any cost, and carrying the products of the West to the East and the East to the West for nothing. We know very well that it must cost the Government at all events at least as much as it would cost individuals to build these roads. We know from our past experience that it costs this Government more to do anything than private individuals, and if we undertake to derive any advantage from the investments made, the cost of transportation will be just as dear then as it is now, unless we undertake to make them altogether free, and then what is to become of other interests of a private or State character?

But, sir, I care nothing for that. My objection is to the comprehensive power of the Government, that is to exhaust itself upon every enterprise in the land. We are beginning to take into our possession all the interests and the industries of the country. We are to comprehend manufactures, we are to take the elections, we are now to take the railroads and canals, we are to take education, we are to take the public schools under our control. In fact, nothing is to escape our power or our vigilance. To such a system as this, yielding to this Government this great power of going into the States and comprehending everything possessed by them and by their citizens, making this a consolidated Government in fact, I am unqualifiedly opposed.

We may suffer something for the time from the evils that are complained of in respect to the subject of transportation; but the material interests of the country cannot be injured. They are progressing; they are going forward surely; and the intervention of this Government often impairs their energy and their progress. Let the people alone and let those interests alone. Let capital go where it is demanded; let private interest project these enterprises, and they will be built wherever they are required, and in time as they are required.

But, Mr. President, there is something beyond this resolution, and I know precisely where it is going. There is a powerful organization in the West known as the grangers. The direction of that movement is now, it may be said, against the party in power, or against the Administration. That movement is to be captured if possible. They have raised the cry of cheap transportation, cheap transportation at any cost and at all events. This resolution is brought forward to catch that sentiment, and direct it if possible into the republican fold. It is a powerful movement, and it is important that an advance be made for its favor. The idea was thrown out by the Executive of the United States in his late annual message; it is before us now; and, as was truly said by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] this great question is to involve parties and individuals; and it is because of that fact that we are here to-day considering this question. It is to meet that very sentiment in the threshold, it is to give direction to that sentiment, in order that we may have a successful political issue at the next presidential election. This resolution is but a preparatory step, because now nothing will be done; and I venture to assert nothing will be done at the next session of Congress. The reports of the engineers may be made, but nothing definite will be done; but every hope will be held out for the coming presidential election to all that class of people interested in putting upon the Government of the United States the transportation of their products, and it will be an element in that election not to be depreciated or discarded. I appreciate its power; we must all appreciate its power.

So far as I am concerned, upon a question of this kind, as a democrat, I cannot recognize any such principle in the democratic platform; and whatever may be said by gentlemen on the other side, I know there are many republicans who never can recognize the establishment of such a vast system in this Government. This question may result in the disturbance of party organizations as now existing. This resolution may be preparatory to that event. It may be intended to catch the popular applause of the West in order to secure this end.

Sir, I care not for party organizations; I care not for party affiliations unless based upon principles I approve. I look behind them to the character of our Government, and the necessity to the people of keeping it to its original Constitution. I care not what kind of a Government we may have; we may have a monarch; we may have an emperor; we may have a despot; but the material interests of this country cannot perish. The people that are obliged to live here will live here still; they have now nowhere else to go; no new country to flee to in case of change or oppression. So far as the material interests of the country are concerned, with an ocean before us and an ocean behind us, embracing a continent not surpassed by any other on earth in all the materials of prosperity and wealth, years will roll on and populations and wealth will increase with all kinds of material power; and it is not in the nature of things to repress or destroy them, I care not what form of government you may have, so that it is a government maintaining order.

But, sir, I am one of those who care not for material progress or material prosperity if the people be not free. Whatever material prosperity may surround us under a consolidated government; we may have riches, millionaires; we may have pomp and splendor and power; we may have luxury and every kind of easy enjoyments; but I would not give the liberty of the citizen and the pure and simple republican institutions of our fathers for all of them. The establishment of a system of internal improvements of the kind recommended by the committee tends to consolidation, and consolidation tends to despotism. Consolidate our State governments, swallow up their local institutions, and press into one vast machine all the hopes and interests of the citizen, and you have a despotism at once and in fact.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of elaborately discussing the question now before the Senate. When the report of the engineers is made, and I presume it will be made at the next session of Congress, the whole question will be before us for consideration. If the information called for by this resolution is desired by gentlemen on this floor, I would not object to it if it could be obtained in a proper way; but when it is announced on this floor so unqualifiedly that this resolution is intended to inaugurate this policy of internal improvements and that gentlemen mean it in that way, I must object at the threshold to its adoption. I must acquire my information, if acquired at all, from other sources, and we have many from which we can acquire it. I must obtain it from my general knowledge of the country and from the knowledge of individuals in localities, rather than undertake at this time to indorse a measure which in my judgment will lead to the worst results.

I am not discussing the general questions that must necessarily result from the adoption of such a system—its antagonisms to other great interests, its requisitions upon one locality to pay for improvements in another. I am not discussing the great constitutional objections that have been urged against a system of this kind by men who in their day were not Lilliputians, though it may be that they are far excelled in mental stature by the Brobdingnagians of the present day. Jackson, Benton, Wright, Calhoun, and all that class of eminent statesmen stood upon the Constitution as they understood it in its simplicity and purity and strictness, while they were antagonized only to a qualified extent, when we consider what is now projected, by other no less distinguished statesmen, as Webster and Clay. Gentlemen of the present day revel in the present material prosperity of the country, and there is our great mistake; we are too fast, too far-reaching. Reveling in our great material prosperity, we lose our reason in our fancies and hopes, and we are willing to go far beyond what the statesmen of the last generation ever contemplated, ever thought of, or ever dreamed of; and far beyond what common prudence, even at this day of wild ambition and gilded visions, would suggest. It is almost a dream to imagine that we should be here to-day and attempting to inaugurate a system as comprehensive, I may say as exhaustive, as the one projected by this committee. Mr. President, I fear it; I fear the consequences that may ensue from it; and therefore without further tresspassing upon the time of the Senate I announce that I shall vote against the resolution with all the earnestness that my sincere convictions require me to do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this resolution is one of such interest that I purpose for a few minutes to consider it.

A hundred years ago, a very short period in a nation's life, it is when your father's father and my father's father were on the stage of action, then the western valley was a wilderness inhabited by savages. Now in ten States and four Territories, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and in the Territories of Colorado, Utah, Dakota, and Wyoming, an area of more than a million square miles, there are fifteen millions of people. They have more than twenty-eight thousand miles of railroad, which cost between $1,400,000,000 and $1,500,000,000, in that wilderness of a hundred years ago. They have every variety of climate and production, some of the noblest rivers and lakes in the world. Their wealth and productions are so vast that it seems impossible to find means of bringing their products to the market.

Coming down to a later period, say sixty years ago, the means of transportation between the East and the West was by turnpike from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, and then by the national road from Baltimore to Wheeling on the Ohio. At that date transportation was carried on in long trains of Conestoga wagons, traveling only about three miles an hour. At that period the question came up whether it was constitutional to invest the public money in works of internal improvement, as was proposed to be done by constructing the national road. My friend from Maryland has not exaggerated in his description of the high character of the debate which then occurred. There were giants in those days, and I think it was then settled forever that our Constitution was equal to the manifest destiny of this great country. If we had not the constitutional power to promote interstate communication, it seems to me we could not have a nation. I consider also that question as settled by the repeated appropriations that have since been made for works of internal improvement.

Fifty years ago, to come down still later, there was a new era in interstate commerce. In 1817 that great work, the Erie Canal, was commenced. It took eight years to complete it, at a cost of $7,000,000. In the course of ten or eleven years it was found to be quite inadequate to the demands and purposes for which it was intended, and in 1836 an enlargement was commenced which progressed without interrupting the use of the work for twenty-six years and was completed I believe in 1862 at a cost of $32,000,000, making the whole expense of that canal $39,000,000. Now, sir, if the State of New York out of its treasury can spend $39,000,000, I think the United States need not hesitate to spend a few hundred thousand dollars in ascertaining the best plan for future operations and improvements.

To come down still later, forty years ago railroads superseded to a great extent canals. The effect of their introduction was to give an impulse to commerce, and agriculture, and immigration, and civilization. These railroads brought our lands generally into market. Before that time the lands were principally occupied on or in the vicinity of navigable rivers. It appears by the report of June, 1873, that we then had in this country completed more than sixty-seven thousand miles of railroad at a cost greater than our national debt, a cost of $3,100,000,000. And yet we are still in want of cheap transportation; and I think for two reasons: first, because, although we have afforded the means for transportation thus rapidly, the progress of the wealth and production of the country has outrun even these facilities; and, secondly, because in latter years the railroads of the West have been built with the proceeds of bonds, and stock has been issued which does not represent capital. As results of this vicious practice, not only is there in the country a fictitious and false representation of values and of property, but the fact of the existence of this unpaid stock creates a pretext for such railroads imposing exorbitant charges. This is true however only of a small portion of the railroads, and those principally in the West, and is not in any considerable extent true of our eastern roads.

Now, Mr. President, as to the remedy. How are we to get cheap transportation? We shall make a great mistake if we undertake any system of canals except in aid of the natural water-ways of the country. Pennsylvania tried the experiment of having canal transportation across the Alleghanies, and has abandoned the work. The want of water and the extensive lockage required are fatal objections. The true remedy and the best relief is by means of railroads, and those roads to be built by private enterprise and private capital. We should give every encouragement to such investments, taking care that proper restrictions are imposed to prevent the issuing or the multiplying of unpaid-for stock.

If we are to seek transportation by water, it seems to me that nature has pointed out the only two water-ways that can be made available on the continent: the one by the lakes, the other by the Gulf, the two connected by the Mississippi and its tributaries. Take the northern route, starting up Lake Michigan, through Lakes Huron, Saint Clair, and Erie, to Buffalo. When there, we should reject the project sometimes suggested of enlarging the Erie Canal, because such enlargement would be to waste the vast expenditure which has been incurred in perfecting that work; but from Buffalo transportation should be by the Welland Canal, through Lake Ontario and the Saint Lawrence, to some convenient point, probably opposite Montreal; then by a canal across to Lake Champlain, and so down the Champlain Canal to Troy or the Hudson. The route by Lake Ontario is much greater in distance than by the Erie Canal, but not so much longer in point of time, because your progress is on lakes and rivers and not so much on the tedious canal. That is the natural water-way for much of the products of the country.

Then as to other routes, transportation should be down the Ohio River, the Missouri River, and the other tributaries of the Mississippi; then down the Mississippi to its mouth, and at that point there should be the expenditure by the Government to overcome the obstruction of the mud deposit; it should probably be by making a canal from the river to the Gulf with a lock that would exclude the mud-drift and yet admit and pass vessels; and then passing east until you come to Florida, where there might be another canal constructed across Florida, thus bringing New Orleans six hundred miles nearer to New York than when you are obliged to go around through the straits of Florida.

I think this resolution would be very much improved if instead of specifying the four different routes to be surveyed, the resolution was so framed as to leave it with the committee from time to time to direct the surveys, so that in the event of its being found impracticable to perfect any one of these routes suggested in the resolution it might at once be abandoned and expense thus be saved to the Government. Thus I hold that the United States Government has the constitutional right to make internal improvements and to promote interstate commerce; that the best way to obtain cheap transportation is to encourage the construction of railroads by private capital and enterprise, prohibiting the issue of unpaid-for stock, and that the two natural water-ways, the one by the lakes and the other by the Gulf, should be improved, and thus great relief in the matter of transportation would be secured.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am not prepared and do not desire at this stage of the consideration of this subject to submit at any length the views I entertain of the want of constitutional power in Congress to enter into this proprietorship and management of interstate railroads or interstate canals or other artificial means of communication between the different sections of our country. I see in it but another illustration of the increase of the power of interest, the love of wealth, the growth of material prosperity over what were intended to be the institutions of our Government. If this Government is to continue federal in its form, if it is to be in substance a union of equal States, and not a unit but a union, measures like this must not be enacted into laws.

I say nothing of the experience of nearly every State in the Union where the management of works of this public nature has been attempted, and the universal result which has been arrived at in every State of the unfitness of our form of government to undertake and conduct the management of public works of this character. Witness the State of Pennsylvania, her management under State ownership of her railways and canals. In what did it result? In corruption and mismanagement, in loss, and in the final relinquishment of the attempt to manage and conduct such enterprises by official machinery. Perhaps under other forms of government, with that greater stability of official position which accompanies a monarchy, there may be a possibility of success, although even there it has been found, if we take the illustration offered by the kingdom of Great Britain, better to consign the management of these great public thoroughfares to the hands of corporations, subject to proper State regulation.

It is but lately that I have read the history of the attempt of the British government to conduct the telegraph as a governmental institution, of the loss, of the mismanagement, and of the results which are open to any man's examination, showing that it would have been better far not to have attempted it, and better to-day to transfer it from governmental control.

But whether it be expedient or not under our system of government to intrust the management of extensive and complicated works of this nature to the hands of government officials, is not the only question; nor is it the one which at present I care to discuss. I merely refer to it, and intend to do no more. But the other question, the question that as a member of one of the branches of the Federal Congress I am always to consider, is the want of power or the existence of power in Congress to enact into law measures which are presented to it. What is the necessary result of admitting that under the grant of power to Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States" thereby the power is given to Congress to enter any or all the States and not only to regulate commerce among the States, but to regulate commerce in the States, for such is the necessary result of the proposition contemplated and recited in the present resolution? Can it be done? Are the people of this country and are the several States of this Union prepared to relinquish their right of eminent domain, their right of control over the persons and property within their respective limits, which necessarily is involved in the construction and maintenance of railways or canals within the borders of a State by other than State power?

As yet we have no precedent for the exercise of such power by Congress. The adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject are plain and unmistakable. One of their late distinct expressions of this subject was made in 1865 in the case of Gilman vs. The City of Philadelphia, where resort was had to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to prevent the erection of a bridge over a navigable stream within the limits of the State of Pennsylvania. The power of the Government of the United States over the navigable waters of the entire country, whether they skirted the borders of a State or whether they penetrated the body of a State, was admitted and clearly asserted, and equally was the declaration made by the court that other powers touching the control over the soil of the State, all those powers included in the term of the right of eminent domain of the State or sovereign, reside in the States exclusively. The court in that case, referring to the decision in the case of Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, say:

> The right of eminent domain over the shores and the soil under the navigable waters, for all municipal purposes, belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they only, have the constitutional power to exercise it.

In Gibbons vs. Ogden, Chief Justice Marshall, in referring to inspection laws, declared them to—

> Form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government; all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass.

At the day that decision was rendered railways using steam-power were unknown. The turnpike was the only highway. Railways now for the general purposes of transportation have taken the place of turnpikes.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Gilman vs. Philadelphia, which I read from, declares that—

> Bridges are of the same nature with ferries, and are undoubtedly within the category thus laid down.

The category within which the State has exclusive power of legislation. The court in this case say:

> The national Government possesses no powers but such as have been delegated to it. The States have all but such as they have surrendered. The power to authorize the building of bridges is not to be found in the Federal Constitution. It has not been taken from the States. It must reside somewhere. They had it before the Constitution was adopted, and they have it still. "When the Revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soil under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government."

Mr. President, we are asked to appropriate a sum of money. I do not doubt that under the careful supervision of the committee of intelligent and respected members of this body to whom this subject has been committed the amount asked for is reasonable and duly proportioned to the object in view, and that if the proposed railway routes are to be surveyed they are properly described; I do not question that. But whether it be large or small, the question is as to the power of Congress to appropriate money for this proposed end. What is the end? The end is the creation of railways and canals by the Federal power within the limits of States without the assent of States; to condemn and take possession of land within the limits of a State by virtue of that right of sovereignty which the court of last resort of this country, which the historical record of this country, which the plain language of the Constitution of this country, which regard for the frame-work of the Government of this country all declare must necessarily be deposited in the State itself exclusively. What is the use of States undertaking hereafter by their chosen Legislatures to pass upon the expediency and the wisdom of granting franchises for the construction of public highways from point to point within their limits? It will be made futile or worse than futile, because if this power does exist co-ordinately with the State, one of the two must be paramount. The Federal Government does not depend for its powers upon the will of State Legislatures, nor do the State Legislatures depend for their just powers upon the will or control of the Federal Government. Each within its sphere is equally to be respected; each within its sphere is equally essential for the preservation of our Federal form of government. The concession of the principle which lies within this resolution puts an end to all the heretofore accepted theories of State governments in regard to their exclusive and unrestricted exercise of their confessed right of eminent domain; for if the power exists in the Federal Government, it is not worth while to say that a State holds one similar and subordinate.

Mr. President, there can be no scheme for the happiness and prosperity of any portion of this country in the contemplation of which I find aught else than satisfaction. The spectacle afforded of the grandeur and the growth of the Western States of this country fills my mind with admiration and happiness. There is no particle of envy, no desire to withhold them from the most glorious career which can possibly be open to them. But surely, if our Government was formed upon wise principles, the mere accumulation of wealth should weigh but lightly when it is to be attained at the cost of the perpetuity of those institutions. If it makes our people more free that this should continue a Union of equal States with powers essential for their own government, do not risk their constitutional liberties in a vague and blind pursuit of material advancement and prosperity. Besides, this material advancement and prosperity ought not to be dependent upon governmental favor. There have been wonderful exhibitions of the force of human ingenuity, of industry, of enterprise, which have made this country a marvel to those who have contemplated the more slow progress of other nations and other times. Why then press forward in this hot haste to grow merely rich, without regard to the preservation of the forms of a government which have made it possible for us to be both rich and free at the same time?

This measure contains the elements of centralization, plainly, manifestly, overwhelmingly, in a degree far in excess of anything that we have precedent for. The Federal Government is hereafter, according to the doctrines of this measure, to have the power, at the will of Congress, to enter a State and lay down its highways through the farms, houses, and private property of the citizens of that State, or use and occupy railways and other highways constructed under State laws; the needs of the State itself are not to be inquired into; the convenience of its citizens or the repayment to the inhabitants for the deprivation of their property which they may have sustained is not to be inquired into; their will is altogether overlooked. All the care which their people have heretofore exercised, all the discretion, all the intelligence of their Legislatures are to be entirely disregarded, and the will of Congress, the will of distant rulers, of men totally unacquainted with the wants and perfectly regardless of the desires of the people of the States, is to be put in place of the will of the inhabitants locally to be affected by the proposed railways or canals. In other words, it is to be another blow at that local self-government which is the best nurse and the best instructor that republican citizens can have, and one that is essential. Without exercising these faculties of self-government, the power to use them will be lost. And here is a proposition that, more than any other which has yet been presented to us proposes to deprive the people of the States of control over matters within their State and which by the charter of our Government were left to the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the States.

Why, sir, there is no necessity for the Government's hand in this. Where has there been objection to connecting railways? A man may pass from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, from the Saint Lawrence to the Gulf, and everywhere find that the spirit of union, the spirit of self-interest, of local self-interest, has made the connection of railways and of other public highways a necessity. There are some great natural highways, such as the Mississippi River, belonging to the whole country, and legitimately within the control of Congress. But the river Mississippi is not within a State; it flows through, it passes by numbers of States, and being a navigable river is expressly within the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States. There is no pretext to say that any State of the Union has ever presented an obstacle to the free transit of all States, to free intercommunication with all States. None has been so blind, so unwise: none has been so untrue to the Union of the States as by State legislation or State power to attempt to throw any obstacle in the way of free intercommunication.

Why, then, when all has been free, when all has been accomplished by voluntary action, when all that is asked for now has been done, and been done without compulsion by the States and by the people of the States, why is it necessary to invoke this extraordinary, unprecedented power of the Federal Government to do that which the States themselves are not only amply able to do, but which they have so often and so freely expressed themselves willing and desirous to do?

Of course, Mr. President, I design to say nothing in regard to the routes spoken of in the resolution. I speak only of my objection to the entire scheme. I have deliberated upon the subject and I cannot find in my conscience any ground for voting this money for the purpose designed. If the resolution shall pass, as I expect it will be the pleasure of the Senate to pass it, it must pass with my vote recorded in the negative; and when hereafter measures shall be perfected for carrying into effect this vast scheme of public improvement, of the proprietorship of these vast lines of railway by the Government and their management by Federal officials, then, unless my views shall have changed; unless they shall have been enlightened by some means as yet unknown to me, and I have still a seat here, my voice will again be heard in favor of retaining these limitations upon the power of the General Government, which are in my opinion essential to the liberties of every individual who lives under its control and which are essential to maintain that Federal Union between free and sovereign States which cannot be maintained if measures like the present shall receive the assent of Congress.

Mr. GORDON.. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss this general subject. I shall reserve what I have to say upon the general question of the proposed system till that question is properly before the Senate. I wish, however, to offer two amendments to the resolution which I think the chairman of the committee will accept, and which I trust will meet the objections of the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Maryland.

There are those—and I class myself among them—who desire this system of internal improvements to be made, but have our peculiar ideas as to the plan upon which the improvements shall be made. I propose to leave that question open; and the amendments which I now suggest are intended for that purpose, to rid us of the difficulties which now intervene and transfer all this discussion upon the plan on which this shall be done, whether by Government or by Government aid to corporations, to a future day when the general question will be properly before us.

I propose two amendments, both coming in the second "whereas," one at the end of the third line after the words "governmental control," to insert "or competition encouraged by Government aid," leaving the question in abeyance. The other is in the last line of that whereas, after the words "national Government" to insert "or by the extension of Government aid to private corporations."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WINDOM. The principal objection I have to the amendment is that it would not speak the truth. The "whereas" to which the Senator refers says:

Whereas the Select Committee on Transportation, after full investigation of the subject, report that, in their judgment, cheap transportation can only be obtained through competition, &c.

The report is made and in print, and this recitation of that report is substantially as it was made by the committee. If the Senator's amendment should be adopted it would make the report of the committee say what it has not said already as we have printed it. The preamble is simply a recitation of the report of the committee.

Mr. GORDON. Then I trust the chairman of the select committee will agree to so change that paragraph as to make it conform to these amendments. The chairman of the committee I think will agree that all reference to the committee's report can be left out of that paragraph. I should like very much to see the amendments made. I think they would remove all the difficulty in the way.

Mr. WINDOM. I think there ought to be no difficulty on that subject. If the Senator will remember that this is nothing more than a recitation of the report of the committee on that subject, and as the Senate does not commit itself to that particular theory and only quotes the report of the committee, it seems to me the Senator on reflection will find no difficulty on that point. I could not well accept an amendment of that kind unless I had authority to recommit the report and amend it, because the resolution would not be in accordance with it unless the report be amended if we change this recitation as suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, I earnestly urge the passage of the pending resolution, believing that the best aim for legislation as regards material interests should be to provide means for the early and extensive development of our own resources by facilitating the transmission of exchangeable commodities in the most economical manner, creating profitable commerce both foreign and domestic. Concerning commerce, Queen Elizabeth wrote as follows:

No place enjoys all things pertaining to man's use but that one country has need of another, by which means men of remote countries have commerce one with another, and by their interchange of commodities are linked together in amity and friendship.

Now, the power of man over the productions of the earth extends only to change of form and of place, and both these changes are made with a view to use, which political economists call consumption. Hence Bastiat truly states that the problem of civilization is "how to bring what is produced at the cheapest rate to where it must be consumed." This great problem was submitted to the Select Committee upon Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and they have recognized the facts that the solution requires intelligent conformity with the laws of nature; that those laws will protect themselves, however much they may be neglected in hypothetical argument or ignored even in the highest form of human enactment. You could as soon raise the paper-weight from your desk by the mere force of a logical demonstration as make it possible by simple congressional enactment to transport freight between the interior and the sea-board by rail as cheaply as it can be done by water. It is not necessary here to enter into a discussion of the reasons; they are familiar to those who have studied the subject; and the practical fact is admitted by all, though often ignored in our disregard of true political economy. As a consequence of such disregard comes the state of facts hinted at in the following statement of the New York Commercial Advertiser:

In this connection an alarming statement comes from the Senate committee which has so thoroughly investigated the transportation question. This is to the effect that the Russians are so cheapening the production of grain that they can lay wheat down in our ports at less cost than the grain of our own raising. This is turning the tables with a vengeance. The granger will be stimulated to fresh antipathy against railroads when he learns that the crop reared by the tender hands of the Wolverine of Wisconsin is to be undersold in Boston by that cultivated by the Cossack of the Don and the Dniper.

This fact results not from cheapening the cost of production, but from scientific recognition of and compliance with nature's laws by Russia. She has been constructing public works that enable light-draught vessels to pass from the Black Sea to the Baltic through her own territory, and again from the Baltic by a succession of rivers and canals connecting them across the continent of Asia to the Pacific Ocean.

These and other improvements for a system of internal navigation she has made in pursuance of an enlightened policy which has attracted the attention of statesmen elsewhere. Disraeli long before his elevation to the premiership of England said:

Sir, we do not look with any jealousy on the natural development of the Russian Empire. [Hear, hear!] Russia is an inland country of immense size, with a very sparse population, producing illimitable supplies of human food and raw material of inestimable price. It follows from such a natural combination of affairs that Russia must force her way to those waters which can alone allow her to communicate with the rest of the world, carry food to their population, and raw material to their manufactories; and the policy of Russia, as it has proceeded now for two centuries, as far as it has been a systematic attempt to obtain this access to the waters of the world, is a natural and inevitable policy, and one which I believe cannot and ought not to be successfully resisted. [Hear, hear!] Its development has occasioned many political circumstances which some of us may deplore. It has cost gallant Sweden some of its provinces; it has cost the empire of Turkey many of its provinces. But, as far as the policy of Russia has been confined to this necessary, and as I maintain inevitable, development, England should view it without jealousy and without fear.

A like policy is necessary for the development and prosperity of this continent. Its inauguration has been already too long delayed; further neglect may occasion political circumstances which some of us may deplore. If we obey not popular demand, based upon justice and sound philosophy, the places that know us now will know us no more forever, and serve us right, however much we may deplore it.

The Legislature of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, as long ago as the session of 1870, sent up a memorial in favor of the construction of the James River and Kanawha Canal, the great central water line recommended by the Senate committee. The people of Kansas regard it as the great needed link of a national system of navigation, which more than any other work would secure to the country the manifold blessings of cheap transportation. I send the memorial to the Clerk's desk to be read:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Legislature of the State of Kansas to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, respectfully represent:

That in accordance with a suggestion made in the annual message of his excellency James M. Harvey, governor of the State of Kansas, and which is as follows: "The rapidly extending railway system meets the demand of the public for the purposes of travel, and the transportation of the lighter and more valuable commodities, even for great distances; but it is a well-ascertained fact that grain, for instance, cannot be profitably sent by rail to a distant market. It is demonstrable that transportation by water is vastly cheaper than is possible by railway. This being the case, it behooves us to look for some water line whereby we can cheaply place our heavy products upon the Atlantic sea-board for distribution there or transmittal to foreign marts. There exist, it is true, routes via the Missouri, Mississippi, and Illinois Rivers, the Illinois and Michigan Canal, the great lakes of the north, and the Erie Canal and Hudson River, or the Welland and Lachine Canals of Canada, and the Saint Lawrence River. The objections to these routes are that they are very circuitous, that they involve the cost of many transshipments, and the payment of tribute to Illinois, the Dominion of Canada, and the State of New York. Moreover, they are closed by ice during a large portion of the year, and rendered dangerous and doubly expensive by tempestuous weather during the season when it is most desirable to move crops; nor can these routes be used without passing through or along the borders of the dominion of a foreign government, thus making their use contingent upon amicable relations with that government. There is also another route reaching the Atlantic by water via the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers to the Gulf of Mexico, thence through the Florida Pass to the ocean; but this route has nearly or quite as many objections as the northern ones through the lakes. This line is also a very long one, and it passes through a climate quite unfavorable to the preservation of most of the products of this latitude. Transshipment at the Gulf is also necessary, and the dangers of navigation in the vicinity of Florida Keys and the Bahama Banks are so great that insurance on voyages that way ranges as high as 2½ per cent. on the value of vessel and cargo. It is the duty of the national Legislature to see that a route is provided from the interior to the sea, which will not tax the labor of the workingman 75 per cent., simply to furnish transportation for the resulting product. In view of these facts, and others which furnish reasons equally cogent, I deem it eminently fit and proper that you should memorialize Congress, asking that, as a national enterprise, the James River and Kanawha Canal be enlarged and completed in such a way as to connect the navigable waters of the Ohio and James Rivers, thus affording means of transit by water from the navigable streams of the interior to the Atlantic Ocean, without the necessity of transshipment, and without risk from climate, tempest, or alien enemy, and at a cost for transportation vastly less than that which is entailed upon us by the inefficiency of the present lines of communication. Our geographical situation should interest us in the prosecution of this work, for when it is completed barges may be loaded at Leavenworth, Atchison, Wyandotte, or any point on the Missouri River, or upon the Kansas River, if some improvements be made for its navigation, and the barges thus freighted could be towed by steam to the head of navigation on the Kanawha River, thence passed through the canal as canal-boats to tide-water in Chesapeake Bay, whence access is easy to the best markets, both foreign and domestic. The barges could be returned to the West freighted with such commodities as may be in demand here. It seems to me that the opening of such a line would greatly enhance the value of all our domestic products and cheapen such articles as we find necessary or desirable to bring from a distance. As a consequence of these advantages the price of real estate would be greatly advanced, and labor made more productive. I make this suggestion not unmindful of the facts that it is our duty and interest to produce or manufacture everything that we can profitably, and that manufactures of many kinds are being established within our borders, yet the capabilities of this State for production are so great that we must ultimately look to distant markets and devise ways and means to place our products there safely and economically. It is to the interest of all, whether engaged in production or traffic, that this be done, for whatsoever adds to the prosperity of consumers increases demand in proportion as the power to purchase is augmented. Additions to the revenues of farmers, manufacturers, and traders enable them to employ professional men and laborers at an increased remuneration. Thus are all benefited by the easy and cheap transit to the best markets of those commodities which are necessary to the comfort and convenience of mankind," the following is submitted: Of all the modes of transportation for heavy and bulky freights none compare with that by water transportation for cheapness, and the growing necessities of the West is to obtain some cheap and expeditious route from the valleys of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers and intermediate points, to the sea-board of the Atlantic, and which shall be open the year round for the transportation of grain and produce of these countries. For the purpose of this transportation the central water line through Virginia and West Virginia appears the most feasible. Its description is as follows: Beginning at the mouth of the Kanawha, two hundred and eighty-four miles below Pittsburgh, the central water line contemplates the improvement of the Kanawha for about eighty-nine miles, so as to give a channel of sufficient width and depth at all times for steamboats and barges; thence for a distance of one hundred and nineteen miles further the stream is to be made navigable with locks and dams. This brings the improvements to the western base of the Alleghany Mountains, where the canal proper commences, which extends from thence two hundred and seventy-two miles to Richmond, and from thence ship navigation of about one hundred and twenty-five miles reaches Hampton Roads, near the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay. This improvement will form a continuous water line from the Ohio River to Hampton Roads, a distance of about six hundred and five miles, when it reaches one of the finest harbors on the Atlantic, both the harbor and the outlet to the ocean having sufficient depth to float the largest ships, with easy egress and ingress to and from the ocean, and being always free from obstruction. The States west of the Mississippi, including Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and the States west of these, with portions of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, and Kentucky, would have easier access to the markets by the way of James River and Kanawha Canal than by any other route, all things taken into consideration.

The benefit of cheap transportation accrues to the producer, and the surest way to encourage commerce is to give the West a cheap highway to the sea. This route affords not only the cheapest highway between the granary of the country and its market-place in peace, but in war it offers inland lines of communication which no enemy can cut. Such works of improvement in their way are calculated to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare of the entire country. By the way of the Mississippi, Gulf of Mexico, and Florida Pass, there is danger not only from the heat of summer to grain and produce, but in times of hostility there will be danger from the enemies' cruisers from the mouth of the Mississippi River to New York, or some destination farther away. Besides, this route will require a voyage of thirty-five hundred miles from the place of production to the wharves of New York, when, with completion of the Virginia route, it might be shortened to one third that distance, with a safer inland water-route under our own control to the very sea. But objections to the route by the way of lake, river Saint Lawrence, and its gulf, are still more formidable. The way is not our own, but such as others may overlook and at pleasure dispute and endanger, if not forbid. Yet this neighbor upon the north is fast at work making this route as convenient and feasible as possible, with the hopes of being able to do our carrying trade of the West. The people of Canada are pushing forward those works which are necessary to increase the capacity and facility of this route, expecting thereby to reap the advantage above referred to.

The routes, both by lake and gulf and Saint Lawrence, lie beyond our own borders; and what great nation was ever known to allow its chief highway of commerce to pass beyond its own borders, to depend for safety upon the forbearance of foreign powers, when by the expenditure of a sum quite within its means a shorter, better, cheaper, and perfectly safe way may be opened entirely within its own borders? It is true that there is a route by way of the lakes and Erie Canal talked of and in use, but it cannot do one tithe of the business required by the West, while a portion of the route is closed by the frosts of winter five months in the year; and much more of this route would be by canal, and pay tolls to the State of New York, than would be by the Central Virginia route. The more lake and river transportation, and the less canal, the cheaper the freight. We must look for the route that has the most natural water transportation, and that is in the climate where the frosts of winter do not linger in the lap of May. Nor can the produce of the West be carried over extensive railroad lines. Such transportation is more expensive than any other, besides its entire inadequacy to meet the demands of the country. Good authority has said: West of the Missouri River, from Sioux, Omaha, Leavenworth, and Kansas City, there is a country extending for hundreds of miles still farther from the Atlantic, with immense capacity for the production of wheat and corn, beef and pork, which must either remain uncultivated or be furnished by some better and cheaper outlet.

The vast regions, too, west of the Upper Mississippi must remain valueless as a grain-producing region, though of almost boundless capacity for the small cereals, unless a less costly route be furnished to market than the one by railroad, or even by railroad and lakes. But let us compare the difference in price of freight by railroads and water communication. We will take the two great competing lines of the New York Central and the Erie roads as an average of what such roads can do. From the official reports of these roads for the year 1866, the rates per ton per mile charged for that year were as follows:

New York Central, per ton per mile, 2.92 cents; or for the whole distance from Buffalo to New York, the sum of $12.85, or at the rate of 35⅕ cents for a bushel of wheat.

Erie Railroad, 2.45 cents per ton per mile, or for the whole distance from Erie to New York, four hundred and sixty miles, the sum of $11.27, or for a bushel of wheat, 34⅘ cents.

Taking the thirteen principal roads of New York, and the average of charges is about 2.78 cents per ton per mile.

The conclusion arrived at by a convention held in New York, representing the principal railroad interests of the United States, was, that railroads for ordinary transportation of freight and passengers cannot be constructed and operated at a lower charge than 2 cents per ton per mile. It is stated on reliable authority that freight can be carried over the lakes on long voyages for 2½ mills per ton per mile, while it can be carried in barges by river navigation at 3 mills per ton per mile.

The average charge per ton per mile for ten years on the New York Central was 2.60 cents, while on the Erie road for the same time it averaged 2.20 cents per ton per mile.

We will now take the most expensive water transportation and compare it with the railroad transportation for the same time.

The average charge by the twelve canals of New York per ton per mile for the same time was 9 mills, nearly one-half of which were tolls, and this can be reduced by competition and yet pay at the rate of 6 mills per ton per mile, or about one-fourth of the railroad charges. The distance from Leavenworth City, on the Missouri, to Hampton Roads is about two thousand miles, about one-fourth of which will be by canal or river improvement, paying tolls. The balance of the route will be over lines less than one-half the cost of canal transportation, and consequently less than one-sixth the cost of railroad transportation. Over this central route through Virginia by water our heavy produce can be carried to the sea-shore for about one-sixth it can be by rail.

To recapitulate:

By lake navigation, when the distance is great, produce can be transported per ton per mile for	2½ mills.
By river transportation, per ton per mile	3 mills.
By canal, per ton per mile	9 mills.
By railroad, per ton per mile	2½ cents

From these evidences, which will not deceive, then, if we would have the producers of the West thrive upon their own labor, we must establish a cheap water communication with the sea, whereby we can reach the great markets of the world. At present we have not lines enough to carry the freight; hence we receive no benefit from competition. The only inland water line by which the Mississippi Valley can be connected with the ocean, so as to have at all times and under all circumstances, in peace and war, a convenient and unmolested highway to the Atlantic sea-front, leads through Virginia; and until the country avails itself of this highway there is no protection in war for western commerce, and farmers there must console themselves as best they may under the reflection that they are cut off with their produce from commercial intercourse with the great markets of the country and from the highway of nations. It is clear that the water line through Virginia, in the language of General Washington's letter to Governor Harrison, is the shortest, easiest, and least expensive communication with the invaluable and extensive country west of the Alleghanies. It has been said by a distinguished engineer of another country that "the commerce of the Northwest is not any fanciful speculation, nor is its magnitude in any way questionable." It is a reality, as inquiry will establish. It has outgrown the Erie Canal; and the complaint of the West is that the quantity carried is so immense, that carriers can command their own prices. The condition of the producers of the West has been described without exaggeration as that of men shut out from the markets of the world, oppressed by the excessive production of their own toil, which remains wasting and worthless upon their hands, depriving labor of half its reward, discouraging industry, and paralyzing enterprise. In many localities the produce is even without value, for it is without a market.

It is estimated that 500,000,000 bushels of Indian corn or maize are raised in the Northwest, but not 5 per cent. of this amount finds its way to the sea-board, owing to the expense of getting it there; and that out of 60 cents paid in New England for a bushel of corn, only 9 cents goes to the producer, the remainder being expended in freights and commission. In 1836 the construction of a canal was begun, 5 feet deep, 30 feet wide at the bottom, and 50 feet at the water line; of this, some two hundred miles, costing the State of Virginia over $10,000,000, is now in use, leaving something over one hundred miles yet to be finished, but it should be enlarged for the whole distance; and it is understood that all that has been done on State account will be relinquished if the General Government will make the enlargement and complete the work as a free highway for all the States. This canal should never be suffered to fall into the hands of a corporation, nor should it be controlled by State or States. One reason of this will be more obvious when we reflect that the West has already paid to the State of New York more than $50,000,000 for canal tolls alone, being in addition to the freight. As the benefit of completing this line of transit by water through Virginia will accrue to a great portion of the people of the whole country, thus making it of national importance, it becomes a great work for the benefit of the people by the General Government. For the purpose, therefore, of obtaining such aid from the General Government as the magnitude of the project requires for its completion—

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring therein,) 1. That the communication by water between the valleys of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, by way of the Ohio, Kanawha, and James Rivers, to Norfolk, Virginia, by means of certain improvements, is a national work of vast importance to the whole country, and particularly to the grain-producing States of the West and Northwest, from which the East draw their supplies.

2. That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representative be requested, to use their best efforts to obtain such aid from the General Government as will insure the early completion of the above-mentioned line of water communication.

3. That a copy of these resolutions and memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators and Representative in Congress.

I, W. H. Smallwood, secretary of state of the State of Kansas, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original memorial and resolution filed in my office February 14, A. D. 1870.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the great seal of the State. Done at Topeka this 7th day of February, A. D. 1874.

[SEAL.] W. H. SMALLWOOD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. HARVEY. A preliminary survey was made in 1871 and another lately, and General A. A. Humphreys, Chief of the Engineer Department, in transmitting the report of the board of engineers appointed by order of the Secretary of War to examine the James River and Kanawha Canal project, says:

This board was organized (with the addition of an eminent civil engineer of Baltimore, B. H. Latrobe, as a member, at the request of Senator DAVIS, of West Virginia, one of the Senate Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board) in order to comply with the desire of those interested in the proposed water line to secure such additional evidence in regard to the cost of the entire canal, the water supply of the Summit level, the probable time required to complete the work, and other questions involving its practicability, as would place all these matters beyond doubt in the public mind. The points have been so ably presented and discussed by the board that I have nothing to add further than to express my concurrence in the views of the board.

The board consisted of Colonel J. G. Barnard, Lieutenant-Colonel Q. A. Gillmore, Major W. P. Craighill, Major G. Weitzel, and Lieutenant Thomas Turtle, all of the Army Engineer Corps, and Benjamin H. Latrobe, civil engineer. They are engineers equal in capacity and reputation to any in this country or any other.

They commenced their labors in Richmond on the 5th of last February, and after thorough examination of the route from Richmond to the Ohio River, and discussion of the general subject, have unanimously arrived at the following conclusions: First, that it is entirely practicable to connect the waters of the James and Ohio Rivers by a water navigation of seven feet in depth. (The tunnel that will be required would be about the same length as the Mount Cenis tunnel, but it would go through rock very easily excavated, and could be driven from a shaft of moderate height and at a distance seldom exceeding one mile.) Second, that an ample water supply can be commanded. Third, that the tunnel should be a single tunnel, with turn-outs provided in sufficient number to admit of vessels passing. Fourthly, that the proposed water line can be completed in six years at a cost not exceeding $60,000,000, and that the cost may reasonably be expected to be within $55,000,000, and may possibly not exceed $50,000,000. Lastly, that in the opinion of the board this route presents extraordinary claims as the measure of relief to the population of the Western States, in furnishing them for their bulky productions cheap transportation to a market, and for fostering the commerce of the United States by developing immense mineral resources now neglected.

So my friends, the Senators from Illinois and New Jersey, will see that the questions of practicability and utility are settled beyond a doubt, leaving only details to be determined.

This great central water line could be used for about eleven months in the year, and would effectually prevent a few railroad magnates from fixing the rates of transportation for many millions of people.

The fact that provisions and other heavy freights are carried long distances to market by rail results in ruin to producers and great hardship to consumers. The farmer sells his grain at Liverpool prices, less the cost of transportation to Liverpool. Hence his profit is in inverse ratio to that cost; and at certain distances, nothing being left for the producer, production ceases to the great detriment of every other interest.

Men talk about water lines of transportation being obsolete; they say this is an age of iron. So it is; but the law of gravitation is not repealed, and friction still retards motion. Some philosopher said, given atoms and motion, and you have the universe. But commercially speaking, if the cost of the motion exceeded the value of the atoms, bankruptcy would be the result. In the commercial world vast quantities of matter must be moved to enter into new combinations by manufacture, assimilation, or other preparation for use, and to insure beneficial results these movements must be made economically. Theory and practice alike show that this can best be done upon water-ways, or as Pascal poetically styled them, "moving roads," the buoyant power and easy motion of the fluid offering but slight resistance to traction. All matter when put in motion has a natural tendency to go from point to point by the shortest distance, and it requires force to overcome this tendency; and as the exertion of force necessitates expense and deviousness leads to loss of time, it is desirable that these water ways should be constructed in the directions in which our great exchanges are made, that the impulse given to the things in transit may be as far as possible in accordance with the physical requirement to take the shortest way to its destination.

These requirements I think the committee have kept in view. I therefore heartily support the resolution, notwithstanding the defeat of the amendment offered by my friend, the Senator from Nebraska, for the survey of the Missouri River; as that matter did not come within the purview of the instructions given to the committee last session. Knowing that great river cannot long be ignored we may bide our time, giving now our hearty support to the inauguration of a system of transportation which will relieve the phrase "moving the crops" of its present significance to the farmer of moving from him substance and hope then he will have both, and will "jocund drive his team afield," and continue with satisfaction to "feed all."

Like my friend, the Senator from Illinois, I believe fully in the legal right to control railroads and favor its exercise to prevent abuses and extortions; but I reassert the practical fact that to make adequate provision for cheap transportation we must comply with natural laws in making the elements serve us directly by facilitating the movements of our commodities, and indirectly but efficiently in restraining human greed as manifested in its most constant and offensive form, the conscienceless exactions of corporations.

England, not content with the great advantages in the way of cheap transportation resulting from her insular position, has a system of inland navigation so perfect that in the southern half of the island no point is more than fifteen or twenty miles from water transportation, and now British capital is employed in removing obstructions from the Danube and the Nile. She knows the advantages of cheap transportation. They have made "the fast anchored isle" the workshop and counting-house of the world and her coffers plethoric with gold. She sends millions to the ends of the world to facilitate transportation, and we sit here and debate the propriety of spending $200,000 to enable our men of science, whom we have educated for the purpose, to determine upon what conditions as to cost we may avail ourselves of the means which nature has placed within our control to insure our nation prosperity and perpetuity. Let us avail ourselves of what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] some time since called properly the peace powers of the Constitution, promoting the welfare of the people by so regulating commerce that economy may be attainable and labor meet with due recompense.

The world is none too well fed, none too well supplied with commodities, but inefficient means of transportation operate as an embargo upon their transmission from the producer to the consumer, causing great hardship to both. Let us remedy this so far as we have the power, and prove ourselves not unworthy of the trust reposed in us.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no disposition to prolong this discussion, and wish only to refer to one or two suggestions made yesterday before the vote is taken.

The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] misapprehends the purport of the resolution and the recommendations of the committee. His argument assumes that the theory of this resolution and report is that we are to dispense with railway transportation, or to use his own expression, that we are to give up railway transportation in this country. Mr. President, there is no antagonism whatever, in my judgment, between the proposition of this report and our railway system. On the other hand, I believe that if the railway men of the country will study their own interests they will be the advocates of these water lines and join heartily with the people in asking the inauguration and completion of this policy; and for this reason the charges on through freights from Chicago to New York on the cereals of the West, which constitute the largest tonnage, do not afford to those railroads a very great profit. The margin between the actual cost of carriage as proven before the committee and the actual charges is small. The difficulty is that the present system of transportation for cheap and heavy commodities is inadequate to the wants of the country; and it cannot be made cheap enough to answer the demands of commerce and the interests of the great interior basin of the continent. The adoption of this system of improvements, which it is believed by the committee will vastly reduce the cost of transporting these heavy materials, will so encourage and stimulate the products of the West, so increase its prosperity and development, that the lighter freights, the more costly articles which will bear the higher rates of railway transportation, will be so increased that the compensation derived from them by the railroads will vastly more than compensate for anything they will lose by this water carriage. The whole people will be benefited, the public interests will be subserved, the East will get cheaper food, the West better prices, the cotton-planters of the South will be enabled to produce cotton instead of corn, because we can then raise the corn in the West and send it to them cheaper than they can produce it themselves, and the railroads will suffer no loss. Nobody will suffer from it; the whole country, in my judgment, will be benefited, the railroads as well as everybody else. For one, I do not desire to strike down the railroad interest. I will go with my friend, as far as he will go, in curbing and restraining the power of railway monopoly; I will go as far as any one in regulating railway abuses; but I want, in the inauguration of a policy for cheap transportation, such a system as will build up all the great interests of this country. I would like to see the railways benefited as well as everybody else, for I believe that if any one great interest shall suffer the others must suffer with it.

Mr. OGLESBY. As the Senator from Minnesota is about closing the debate on his resolution, and as I agree with him that the resolution should be passed to-day if possible, and not wishing to open another debate after his speech, I beg to make a suggestion to him.

Mr. WINDOM. Very well.

Mr. OGLESBY. His allusion to the position I took on this matter justifies me in asking the Senator one question; and as a basis for the question I will read the second whereas of the resolution:

> Whereas the Select Committee on Transportation, after full investigation of the subject, report that, in their judgment, cheap transportation can only be obtained through competition under governmental control, and operating through cheaper means of transport than are now provided; that such cheaper means of transport can only be provided by the construction of double-track freight railways or by the improvement and creation of water routes.

What I wished to say yesterday, and what I hope the Senator from Minnesota understood me as having said, was that in voting for this resolution, which I shall do, I did not want to commit myself to the doctrine which I understood to be advocated by the report of the committee of which he is chairman, that competition in the estimation of the national Congress between competing private railroad corporations was to be abandoned, and that the only way to control the prices of the shipments of produce East and West was by Government control, either in the construction of railways or the improvement of water-routes.

The idea that I wished to impress upon those who did me the kindness to listen to me was that in voting for this resolution I had not abandoned the idea of competition between private railroad corporations, and that I wished to dissent from the argument in this report that cheaper rates were not to be obtained except by Government control. My idea is that competition between railroads built and operated by private corporations is not to be lost sight of, and I do not wish to commit myself to the declaration that competition is only to come from Government control.

Now, I ask the chairman of the committee if I am to understand that committee, speaking through their chairman, as having adopted the theory that competition between private corporations constructing and operating railroads is abandoned, and that hereafter we are to rely upon competition by routes solely under Government control?

Mr. WINDOM. I am very glad the Senator has suggested that question, and I will read him a paragraph from the report of the committee on that subject:

> Having reluctantly reached the conclusion that the reduced cost of transportation demanded by the public is not to be anticipated from unregulated competition between existing railway companies, nor in competition to be induced by the construction of additional lines under private management and control, the committee will next consider the practicability of direct congressional regulation and the results probably attainable thereby.

The committee did not reach that conclusion without a very careful study of the subject, in which they brought under review the history of railway competition in the principal nations of the world—in England, in France, and in Germany particularly. In England this question has been under investigation for thirty years, and the most persistent efforts have been made by Parliament to induce competition between railways. The report of the last commission, made in 1872, after reviewing the history of railway competition in that country since the introduction of this system of transportation, states that—

> In spite of the recommendations of these authorities, combination and amalgamation have proceeded at the instance of the companies without check and almost without regulation. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the progress of combination has ceased or that it will cease, until Great Britain is divided between a small number of great companies.

They further say that on different occasions there has been effectual competition between railway companies in the matter of charges, and it is probable that charges now made still bear the traces of that competition, "but it may be taken as a general rule that there is now no active competition between different railways in the matter of rates and fares. Wherever different companies run between the same places they arrange their prices." * * "And if a new railway should ever be started with the promise of lower rates, it is sure after a short time to arrange with its original rivals a system of equal charges."

That is the result of forty years' experience in England. Similar results are shown in Germany and in France, and I think it would be safe to say throughout the civilized world. The fact is, that it is not in the nature of railway organization to compete with each other. It is human nature to make the most money possible out of a given business, and railway managers are only human. So long as the business between companes must be divided, so long will they combine to make as much money out of it as possible.

I have no objection particularly to the theory of my friend that we should charter another railway, although I have very little faith in the result to be accomplished by it. If a new railway shall be organized, it will not be six months after it is in operation until it will go into the councils of existing railway lines and agree, as they do now, upon rates to be charged to their customers.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the honorable Senator how that can be if the pending bill, which I had the honor to introduce a few weeks ago and which is now before the Committee on Railroads of the Senate, shall be reported here and shall be enacted into a law by Congress, when a provision in that bill explicitly states that they shall be entitled to charge reasonable rates for the transportation of passengers and freight, and that Congress reserves the right to pass upon those reasonable rates, and if they shall not be reasonable, to establish a tariff by authority of Congress?

Mr. WINDOM. I will answer that by asking my friend another question. The charges during the year 1872 between Chicago and New York were about eleven mills per ton per mile for cereals transported on the trunk lines; and the railroad companies will prove by any number of witnesses you choose to call, when you go into court to establish your reasonable rates, that it costs them from eight to nine mills per ton per mile in actual cash paid out, irrespective of interest and dividends, to transport those commodities, leaving but about three mills per ton per mile difference between the present charges and the actual cost of carriage. I think it would be impossible for my friend to find in any court in Christendom a judge or jury who would decide that two and a half to three mills per ton per mile was too much to pay a fair interest on the actual cost of the road. So, then, if he had his new road in existence under a regulation of Congress to charge reasonable rates, and went into court to prove that existing charges were too high, I think he would fail, because the railroad companies would show that they were not charging him more than a reasonable margin above cost.

The difficulty, as I said a moment ago, is in the system of railway transportation. So long as heavy freights are transported on a road doing a mixed business, where the freight trains are compelled to lay aside by the hour to wait for the passage of the higher grade of trains, so long we shall be compelled to pay somewhere near the rates now charged by the through lines. It is possible, as we attempt to show in the report of the committee, that a freight railway, built for cash, honestly constructed, honestly managed, and run exclusively for freight, would be able to carry goods at much less rates than are now charged on roads doing a mixed business. I believe myself such a road could carry at from seven and a half to eight mills per ton per mile and pay a fair dividend; but until Congress is ready to go into the railway business, until we are ready to inaugurate the policy of freight railways under governmental control, I have no hope that we shall secure much cheaper railway transportation than we have on the through trunk lines.

Mr. OGLESBY. I believe the Senator is trying in common with all the Senators here to get at the true solution of this question, and I appreciate with him the difficulties which meet us at every turn. But as I understand the Senator to say that he is willing to vote for and will support a bill creating a private corporation to construct a railroad leading from the Atlantic coast to the Western Territories through the Union on the plan proposed by the bill introduced by me, that shall reserve the power in Congress to regulate the rates of fare and freight, I ask him if the passage of such a bill by Congress and the incorporation of such a company and the construction of such a railroad will not tend more directly than any other method to the settlement of this question?

If railroads constructed honestly by actual capital can ship freights at a certain rate and can ship them for no lower rate as actual experience shall demonstrate, will not that settle the question of cheap transportation? And as the Senator has intimated a disposition to support such a bill, which I believe will be a practical solution of this question, I shall be content by his support and the support of other Senators to test that question by such a bill as to what shall absolutely be reasonable and just rates by a railroad honestly constructed and honestly operated.

Mr. WINDOM. In answer to the Senator from Illinois, I will say that being anxious to do anything that has the slightest promise, that offers the least hope of accomplishing the result desired, I would vote for his proposition; but in doing so my vote would be given with the weakest possible faith in the result. It does hold out a little hope, and therefore it would get my support; but I must confess if its results depended upon my faith they would be very small indeed, because I think nothing would be accomplished by it, although I would be willing to try it.

Now, with reference to the question of competition about which there has been some discussion, it will be demonstrated to any person who will investigate the subject that water transportation is vastly cheaper than railway transportation; ocean transportation the cheapest; lake the next; river the next; and next canals; and that the latter is more than one-half cheaper in the actual cost of movement than by rail. Now what is the theory of the committee as to the effect of opening these four great channels to be kept forever free to the people? That is all we mean by "governmental control." We do not mean that the Government shall run canal-boats or shall operate these lines, but that the competition shall forever be kept under governmental control by the routes being kept out of the hands of monopolies of every character, precisely as the New York canal to-day is under the control of the State. The State of New York does not run the canal-boats, but it prevents the canal from combining with the railroads which run parallel with it. That is what is meant by the preamble to the resolution where it speaks of "competition under governmental control," that the lines to be opened shall forever be free to the people.

With a system of transportation that is one-half cheaper than any known railway transportation in this country, that is to be forever free to everybody who chooses to put on a horse and a canal-boat, a system of improvement that touches twenty-one States, that connects every one of the States of the Union east of the Rocky Mountains with every other State by water, do we not offer to the railway system of the country the strongest, the most effective, constant, and efficient competition that can possibly be provided?

What will be the result of this, Mr. President? I ask my friend's particular attention to this point, who has some lingering hope yet in railroads.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have of railroads built without the aid of the Government.

Mr. WINDOM. There are a large class of persons in this country, and I think my friend is one of them, who believe in the system of freight railways as the solution of this question. Now, sir, if freight railways are ever to accomplish the result which I believe it is within their power to accomplish, that result will be achieved under the best possible management that can be devised for them. What is the best management, the cheapest and most efficient management that you can have for any enterprise? It is by an individual, who manages it in his own interest for his own benefit.

Now with these water lines open, always offering this free competition, the railroad companies of the country will be themselves compelled to build the freight railways precisely as in the State of New York we now see the New York Central Railroad Company building a freight railway exclusively for freight purposes alongside of the Erie Canal. With these through lines open and kept free to competition, all the leading lines of railroad from the center of the continent to the East will be compelled to adopt the cheapest known system of transport by rail, which is the freight-railway system, and they will be compelled to operate it in the most economical manner if they compete with this cheaper system of transportation. So I believe that by the adoption of this system recommended by the committee, which shall open up these great natural avenues of commerce, offer this free competition to everybody, we shall compel the railway companies to adopt the cheaper system of transport by freight railways, and by the expenditure of money enough to build the one system of water lines the people will have the benefit of both the water lines and the freight-railway system.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. I should be glad to know whether the scheme of the committee contemplates the simultaneous construction of these four lines of transportation mentioned in the resolution, and if so, if the committee have formed any estimate of the expense which will be required to build them?

Mr. WINDOM. The committee have not ventured to express an opinion as to the manner in which they should be built further than this: that they believe this system of improvements is national in its character; that one section of country should not be compelled to develop another section without receiving similar benefits; and in the adoption of a great system of improvements we should consider the wants of the whole country. Believing that this system does equal justice to the entire country, I think it should be considered and acted upon as a whole.

I have no doubt that certain sections of the country, the section in which I live, for example, would receive the full benefit that is to be derived from this system, or very nearly so, by the construction of two of these water lines. After having traveled nearly all over the United States, and having studied the interests and the wants of the various sections of the country, I came back with a desire to benefit all sections equally.

Something was said, I believe, by my friend from Illinois yesterday in opposition to two of these lines, and he said that it would be sufficient to build the northern line and the Mississippi line. I am exceedingly anxious to see these two lines built, and believe that my section of the country would be vastly benefited by them, and while I would vote for them freely, I do not believe it would be fair for this Government to tax the people of the eastern and southeastern portions of the country for these improvements without giving them some corresponding benefits. In preparing their report the committee sought to distribute the benefits of the proposed improvements equally among all sections. There is a very large part of the Southeastern States, the cotton States, that is as much in need of cheap transportation as my own State. I may say the same of the central portions of the country. I desire to see this question acted upon with a national view. I desire to see the whole nation participate in the benefits to be derived from these improvements. I ask in behalf of the people of the South, whose interests I have studied in examining this question, that they, as well as my own constituents, shall receive cheaper means of transport.

My friend from Indiana asks what will be the cost. I stated yesterday that it was the desire of the committee that these surveys should be made in order to ascertain accurately the aggregate cost, but I will say to the honorable Senator from Indiana that I think we can approximate now very nearly the cost of these works. They have nearly all been surveyed and careful estimates have been prepared, with the exception of a few sections of each of the lines, and those have been surveyed, but not with sufficient accuracy to commence work. We have the estimates of the Department upon every part of these four lines, estimates based upon general surveys or upon actual careful surveys for location, generally the latter; and the total cost, if we adopt the water system for the four lines—and by that I mean to include the James River and Kanawha Canal, and the Atlantic and Great Western, running through the southeastern portion of the country—will amount, according to the estimates of the Department, to about $155,000,000.

Mr. PRATT. Over what period of time, I would inquire, is it contemplated that this expense shall run? In other words, how long would the committee propose that the country should be occupied in the making of these improvements?

Mr. WINDOM. It is believed they can be completed in five or six years.

Mr. PRATT. Another question. I notice that one of these improvements to be made is the Mississippi River. I would inquire what is the character of that improvement—whether it contemplates the leveeing of the river?

Mr. WINDOM. That is not included in the report, but only the improvement of navigation.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to this subject of expenditure I want to say a word or two. The answer I have given to the honorable Senator from Indiana will indicate that if it be deemed expedient to enter on these improvements, we shall have to expend from twenty-five to thirty millions of dollars per annum. What is the nature of that expenditure? Where and to whom will the money go? Is it money thrown away? Is it money paid out not to be returned again? Is it money sent abroad to impoverish the country? No, sir. The expenditure of this $25,000,000 a year will give employment to many thousands of men who to-day demand labor. It will enable men who are anxious to work for their living, to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. It will be a vast benefit to the labor interest of the country while the work is progressing. Take the South, Mr. President, your own country, (Mr. GORDON in the chair;) there are thousands and tens of thousands, and I presume I might say hundreds of thousands, of laborers there who would most gratefully welcome this employment. It is so throughout the West and the East. I would not vote to appropriate money simply to give men employment; but if we can give employment to the laboring classes, and at the same time accomplish a work which will return ten or twenty fold its cost to the country, I think it is an economical, beneficial, and advantageous expenditure.

Mr. PRATT. I should like to ask my friend from Minnesota how he proposes to raise the twenty-five millions a year for the purpose of making these improvements?

Mr. WINDOM. I suggested when I had the honor to address the Senate some time ago the mode by which I would raise it; but that of course is a matter for the House of Representatives to consider in the first instance. If they shall approve of this scheme, they will devise ways and means for raising the money. I would do it in one of two ways. First, I would prefer to reinstate the tax on tea and coffee. Since the repeal of that tax, if I am not misinformed, the cost of tea and coffee to the consumer is about the same that it was before the tax was repealed. It has resulted very little to the benefit of the people whom it was intended to serve. It goes, as I am informed by my honorable friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] chiefly to Brazil and China. It goes to the benefit of the foreign producer or to the trader in tea and coffee. The hopes we held out to the people of cheap breakfasts have not been realized by the repeal of that tax. We have not had cheaper tea and coffee by its repeal, and yet we have lost $20,000,000 per annum, or near that, from the Treasury. I would be in favor of reinstating that tax if I were in the other House where I could inaugurate that measure, and I would expend that money for these improvements, thereby giving employment to the unemployed and building up public works which should stand forever as monuments to the wisdom of this Congress.

If that be not deemed advisable, I would issue bonds to raise this money. I do not believe that this nation is unable to meet the wants of the people or incompetent for the fulfillment of its great destiny. All we need is courage, faith, and development. With these there will be no trouble in raising the money to make any necessary improvements to promote and insure its prosperity.

In either of the ways I have suggested this money could be raised without ever being felt. Suppose you issue bonds falling due in twenty years. Fifteen years before those bonds would mature these works of improvement would add twenty times their cost to the wealth of the country, and during the entire time in which they are being constructed the laborers of the country will be benefited; the money will be spent among ourselves. It will tend to restore prosperity, to give a new impetus to business, and it will, as I believe, do more than anything else to place this country again on the highway to prosperity. I believe that the very inauguration of this system will so inspire the people with faith and hope, will so encourage the development of the industries of this country, that you can raise by our present tariff and tax laws more than enough money additional, on account of the stimulus that will be given to industry, to meet the payments which will be required for their construction.

Mr. PRATT. Will my friend pardon me for asking him another question? It is this: Whether the committee in submitting this scheme took into consideration the disastrous experience of some of the Western States which embarked in extensive systems of internal improvement, commenced a great many works—canals, railroads, and macadamized roads—partially completed them, and finally abandoned them, sold out some, gave away the rest, and have scarcely recovered from the effects of their insolvency yet? I speak particularly with reference to Illinois, Indiana, and perhaps Michigan. I remember that in the State of Indiana in 1836 an extensive scheme of internal improvements was inaugurated, and some ten or twelve million dollars borrowed for the purpose of the construction of railways, canals, and macadamized roads. The result has been that only one of the works embraced in that scheme was completed, and that was finally given up in part payment to the bondholders, and is not now self-sustaining. The bondholders considered themselves badly cheated by the operation. They took it for one-half of the debt, and the State became responsible for the remaining half, and has within the last two years paid off the balance of the debt. This occurred in 1836, and we got rid of the last of that debt in the year 1872 I believe.

I know this is rather a long question; but the point I wish to make is, whether the Transportation Committee, in arriving at the conclusion they have and submitting the scheme they have to the Senate, had in view the disastrous results that have followed wherever States have undertaken the construction of works of this kind?

Mr. WINDOM. The committee have considered those questions, and considered them carefully, and I think the Senator has answered substantially his own argument, so far as the State of Indiana is concerned, when he says that they completed but one of those works. If the United States are to enter upon a work which they are not able to complete, it will probably be a failure. The State of Indiana entered upon works which she was unable to complete, works which were not well located and were not needed.

I have heard similar arguments with reference to canals in Ohio; and yet the committee learned in their investigations in that State that those canals that are half filled with mud and only capable of passing boats of about sixty tons burden actually reduced by their potential competition with railroads the rate of freights from Cincinnati to Toledo from twenty-five cents to fifteen cents per hundred immediately upon the opening of those "ditches."

It is true that canals badly located have proved a failure. It is also true that scores and scores of railroads badly located by private individuals have proved a failure too; and precisely the same argument by which my friend would support a theory which I do not think he advocates, but which he argues probably to call me out on that subject, may be applied to railways. If the lines recommended by this committee are not to be great national lines of commerce, they ought not to be built. If they are to be great national lines of commerce they will prove a success.

Now in comparison with those badly located canals which the State of Illinois was unable to finish, take the Erie Canal in the State of New York. If it had not been that the State of New York was wise enough in an early day to build that canal, and we had had nothing but railways and the railways had charged no higher rates than they have even in competition with the canal, the people of the West would have paid $122,000,000 more for the transportation of their freights than they have done. It has not only thus reduced the cost of transportation to the people of the East and the West, but it has been a most magnificently paying institution of itself. I cannot now state the exact figures; but the Erie Canal has paid for itself and placed over $40,000,000 in the treasury of the State of New York.

While the Erie Canal has reduced the cast of transportation and saved the people of the West one hundred and twenty odd millions dollars, it has paid for itself and put $40,000,000 into the treasury of the State beside. This is one of the "ditches" that my honorable friend from Illinois spoke of yesterday when he said that freights would not follow these slow lines of water transportation.

Mr. OGLESBY. I said heavy freights would.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I misunderstood the Senator. It is the relief to heavy freights that we have chiefly considered. I have in my hand a statement showing for five years a comparison between the transportation by lake and by rail: In 1869, 11,000,000 bushels of wheat were transported by lake, against 4,000,000 by rail; in 1870, 13,000,000 bushels by water, against 2,902,000 by rail; in 1871, 12,000,000 bushels by water, against 686,000 by rail; in 1872, 8,831,000 bushels by lake, against 3,000,000 by rail; in 1873, 15,000,000 bushels by lake, against 8,000,000 by rail. The actual movements of commerce, Mr. President, show which is the cheapest mode of transportation.

But it was not my intention to be drawn into a discussion——

Mr. OGLESBY. If I do not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senator will allow me to finish my sentence. I was going to say that I had no design to make a speech and only desired to reply to my friend from Illinois for a moment. I am very glad to have my friend ask any question which I am able to answer on this subject.

Mr. OGLESBY. We are interested in hearing the Senator speak on this question. We know he has studied it, and studied it diligently. I know of no Senator in this body who has worked so faithfully as he has for the last twelve months on this subject, and I hope he will not take it offensively when I tell him I have great respect for his opinion on the subject.

Mr. WINDOM. I accept the compliment.

Mr. OGLESBY. When the State of Illinois in her youth entered upon a project of internal improvements, the members of the Legislature calculated with considerable accuracy upon the number of votes and the support that would be brought to each project. There was only one canal provided for. That was finished, and canal-boats are running upon it to-day. But the Legislature provided for various railroads through the State. Various railroad projects were inaugurated, and the State went along with the system until she involved herself in eleven or twelve millions of indebtedness, and at one time the total indebtedness of the State was nearly seventeen millions. Now, thank God and the industrious people of Illinois, the debt is paid. We only owe $1,800,000 and are anxious to pay it, but the bondholders will not bring in the bonds; they would rather keep them than surrender them.

The point I wish to arrive at is this, if the Senator can solve it for me: When the Legislature of Illinois in 1836-'37 projected the system of internal improvements for the State, they counted so many votes for so many projects, and carried the projects through. Now, has the Transportation Committee in settling upon these four water-routes so arranged the system with reference to commerce, convenience, and practicability, as to feel perfectly sure they can carry the four measures through? Will they have strength enough in Congress to carry the four projects through and chop off all the amendments that shall be offered, such as the Senator from Pennsylvania in one part of that State proposes and the other Senator from Pennsylvania in another part of the State proposes, and the Senator from North Carolina with his ring canal that is to circumnavigate the whole Republic? I wish to know if the Committee on Transportation have calculated well upon the strength they can bring in support of their projects in carrying them through to exclude the little fellows and the little projects and only have those four and no more?

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the Committee on Transportation have entered into no such calculation; but they have calculated upon the good sense of the American people. When this plan was first proposed I was informed by a gentleman interested in a private scheme, "You can never carry those propositions through Congress." "Why?" "Because you have no private interests to back them up." It is true, Mr. President, there are no private interests to be subserved by the measures proposed. The committee have reported against all copartnership with private corporations, and hence the admonition I received before this subject was reported to the Senate was, "You must have the private capital of private parties who are interested in these things to back you up or you cannot go through Congress."

Now, Mr. President, the issue is made. Here is a project that looks to the interest of the whole people, touching twenty-one States of the Union. There is no private interest behind it. There is no money to buy documents or speeches or anything else to aid it before the people. It must stand or fall upon its own merits. We shall see whether the people will look to their own interests and demand the consummation of a measure which is for their own benefit, and which lacks the stimulus of private capital to give it life and strength. Instead of counting votes to ascertain whether their report goes through or not, or looking to private interests to help them, the committee have said: "We will submit a national proposition to the people of this country; we will show them that it will reduce the cost of transportation one-half; that it will add eleven hundred millions to the value of the farms in eight States; that it will give cheaper food to the operatives of the East; that it will enable the cotton-planter to resume the culture of his profitable staple and make his fields to blossom as in the days gone by; that it again gives us control in the food markets of the world; that it will turn the balances of trade in our favor, and enable us to keep our gold and silver at home and thereby hasten the return of specie payments;" in short, that it tends to restore prosperity to every section of the country. We propose to go to the people of the West and tell them "Your burdens shall be lifted and the power of monopoly shall be broken;" to the people of New England and say to the operatives and manufacturers there, "aid us and you shall have cheap food." We propose to say to the laboring classes of this country who want work, "aid us and you shall have the chance to earn bread for yourselves and your families." We have counted upon these influences; we have counted upon the great benefits this country is to derive from this project; and we appeal to the American people for support. We have not counted votes either in Congress or anywhere else.

Mr. PRATT. My friend from Minnesota speaks about having counted noses and counted benefits. I should be glad to inquire of him whether he has counted where the water is to come from to supply the Kanawha and Ohio Rivers during two or three months of the year. I am credibly informed that for the last two or three years the Ohio above Louisville has been so shrunken and dried up that in many places it could be forded on horseback. Navigation was almost entirely suspended.

Then again, in the same connection, I would inquire whether the committee in their investigation ascertained that a canal had ever been constructed, from the beginning of the world down to the present time for six miles through a mountain? I understand the scheme for connecting the Kanawha with the James River contemplates that a mountain shall be tunneled for the distance of six miles for the projected canal. Am I correct about that?

Mr. WINDOM. About seven miles.

Mr. PRATT. As of course the committee are well posted in the history of internal improvements I should be glad to be informed, because I am not posted, whether such a scheme as that has ever been tried, and if so, how it worked?

Mr. WINDOM. I will inform the Senator how he can obtain that information. He can do it by voting for this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby are, instructed to report amendments to the pending river and harbor bill making appropriations for completing the surveys and estimates for each of the improvements recommended by said select committee upon the four routes indicated in said report.

When those surveys are completed by the very men whom you have educated at your public schools at West Point and elsewhere to do this work, when they shall have given us the information with reference to the amount of water in the Ohio River and the practicability of going through a mountain, I shall be ready to answer fully the question of the Senator from Indiana. We have information on that subject. I do not believe that to be an impracticable route; but I desire further information, further surveys with reference to it; and then the report of the committee also contemplates an alternative proposition. We desire those four lines, which are so situated as to afford the greatest advantages to the whole country, built. If, upon the completion of the survey, it is found to be more practicable to aid in the construction or to construct, if you please, a freight railway over one or two hundred miles of that route so as to continue the line, then the alternative proposition is presented by the committee. If it is deemed inexpedient to go through the mountain, if it is deemed impracticable to do it, if it cannot be demonstrated that freights can be carried cheaper by making the canal, then I should favor the alternative proposition of completing that through route by a freight railway. The committee seek to unite the two cheapest systems of transportation; to use wherever they can the great natural water lines, and if it is impracticable to carry them through, then by short freight railways to finish them out.

But, sir, I have taken altogether more time than I intended.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I do not rise at this time to make a speech upon the merits of this subject. I merely rise to explain the reasons why I shall feel it to be my duty to vote for this resolution. I would much prefer to see it amended before I cast my vote for it. Nevertheless, if it is not to be amended, I am willing from a sense of duty to the section of country from whence I come to vote for it as a whole, disagreeing, however, I may say, from the broad ground laid down in the preamble to the resolution. I wish it distinctly understood that in voting for an appropriation to make these surveys I reserve to myself the right when the question comes up before the Senate at a future day for final decision to give that vote which my judgment and my sense of duty shall then dictate.

Last year the Senate authorized the raising of a committee to investigate this subject. The committee made that investigation, and the report of that committee has been laid before this body. From the size of the volume it is very evident that the amount of labor performed by the committee was very great, and I can only commend the committee for having so well performed its duty; I can only commend the chairman of that committee for having with so much ability given us a synopsis of the report in the able speech which he made before this body.

The question of internal improvement by the Federal Government is an old subject. It divided parties many years ago. I am old enough to remember when what is called the Maysville veto was sent to Congress. I am old enough to remember when discussions year after year took place with regard to appropriations for what was then called "the national road," being a turnpike road through the States, running as far as my own State. The great question of internal improvements divided at that day the democratic party from the whig party. I am fully aware of the position then occupied by the democratic party, the party to which it is my pride and my pleasure to belong now; the party to which I have belonged for the years of my life, and in the very darkest hours of its political existence.

Without subscribing to the doctrine or the idea that convenience or beneficent results can give power under the Constitution, I do believe that certain conceded powers in the Constitution may be exercised upon a larger scale at one period than another. There has not been a time in the memory of the oldest Senator on this floor when members of the democratic party did not vote for ample appropriations for our harbors and for the improvement of the rivers of the West. At that day the rivers of the West were amply adequate to the commerce of that vast region. That day has passed. The natural channels that lead from the interior of the continent to the ocean are no longer sufficient for the conveyance of the vast productions of that great region. Hence, if the power existed to vote small appropriations to improve the Ohio, the Mississippi, the Illinois, and many other streams and harbors of the West, I cannot see why the power may not be exercised upon a larger scale to obtain results in proportion to the wants of the present day.

Nevertheless, sir, I do not wish at this moment to discuss that question. I merely throw out these desultory remarks to show that it may become my duty to vote differently from some of my political friends on this floor on this subject. I appreciate the arguments made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] and by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] I fully appreciate those arguments from their stand-point, and it will always be my pleasure to agree with them in regard to qestions of this character generally; but these gentlemen must not forget that they represent on this floor a section of country very different in its wants and needs from the section which I represent. We of the West having become populous, and, producing large crops, need outlets to the ocean, that we too may participate in the commerce of the world, and without those outlets to the ocean we shall be as much secluded from the commerce of the world as China has been by its own course.

It must be known to every gentleman on this floor; it is known to you, sir, (Mr. GORDON in the chair,) that a great party has sprung up in this country called the grangers. It may be that you are a member of it. [The Presiding Officer shook his head.] Well perhaps you ought to be. You come from a farming and a planting country, and it would not be altogether improper if you were a member. I am not a member of the grangers. I cannot belong to the organization, because I am not a farmer although I am a very great consumer. [Laughter.] Nevertheless we do know that such a party has lately arisen in the West, which indeed extends to every State in the Union, in the East and the South, but its peculiar home is the vast region of the West, where nine men in ten have in one way or another identified themselves with that organization; and for what purpose? Can gentlemen on this floor believe that those men have entered this organization for mere low partisan purposes, because they are out of office and want to get into office? Can any one believe that they are impelled by any other feeling in the world but one of absolute necessity? The men of the West who now produce from two hundred and fifty to three hundred million bushels of wheat a year, who raise about a thousand million bushels of corn a year, who have cattle that are fattening upon every hill and in every valley of that region, and have no market for all these vast products, feel that something is due to them. Whether it shall come from the Federal Government or from the State governments or from individual enterprise is a problem not yet solved; but that the want does exist no intelligent man can deny, and no Senator here surely will deny.

The majestic Mississippi River itself, even though its mouth may be opened to the Gulf, whether by canal or by opening one of its natural outlets, will not afford to that vast region a sufficient outlet for its products in a few years from this time. Hence other means of transportation are necessary. Whether those shall be furnished by the Federal Government, by the State governments, or by individuals, I repeat, is yet a problem not solved. I will not now enter into the discussion as to the beneficent results of water transportation as compared with railroad transportation, or the great good which such a channel of transportation as the railroad has conferred upon the entire West. These are things which at the proper time will be all right. I am not now disposed to indulge in speculations in regard to them.

I have heard the slogan that the people of the West have been singing and proclaiming to the world for some time past. It is "cheap transportation." They need it; they are entitled to it. The people of this land are too enterprising, they are too industrious, their energy is too great to be limited to the interior of a continent without the means of getting to the ocean to trade with the world. If, however, the power does not exist in the Federal Constitution to meet this great exigency, I will not violate the Constitution to meet it; but if that power does exist, I shall be in favor of its exercise.

I do not agree with the argument that is often advanced about the expense of this work. The question of expense is of no consequence. Pennsylvania built itself up as a great State by constructing a canal and then throwing it away. Illinois progressed from nothing to a great State by building a system of railroads and then throwing them away. My own State from a wilderness became a great and commanding State, and is destined to be the Empire State of the West, by building a system of railroads, and then I think we lost them by being cheated out of them. We lost them; but the railroads are there. But it is of no consequence to the nation whether you spend $100,000,000 more or less, if you spend that money within your own borders. It is only a system of distribution by which you take the money from the wealthy men, who have something to give, and hand it to the poor man who is a laborer.

Pennsylvania, in spending $10,000,000 among her own people to build her canal across the Alleghany Mountains, lost nothing by it, although a few years afterward that canal was abandoned in favor of another system of transportation. Every dollar expended by Pennsylvania to build that canal was expended in Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania was not one dollar poorer after the canal was built, but was infinitely richer, because she had the canal and other people besides the capitalists had the $10,000,000; that is all. Great expenses by a prosperous nation are like expenses by an enlightened capitalist. An enlightened capitalist makes money by being liberal in his expenditures, by being liberal in his enterprises. Every dollar that he expends returns back to him tenfold. So it is with a nation. If this system should cost $200,000,000, nay $500,000,000, nay $1,000,000,000, let the expenditure be made, provided we of the West can have four great outlets to the ocean. What are $1,000,000,000 compared to the importance to the West of these outlets? What would her vast crop of cereals be worth without these outlets? The question of money is of no consequence beyond the fact that all expenditures must be judicious and must be managed with integrity and honesty.

Mr. President, I come from that section which demands these things. I respect the voice of that people. I hope I may be allowed to say that no man would stand against the senseless cry of a mob longer than I would; but, sir, the people of the West who are making this demand are not a mob. They are the true laboring, enterprising, producing men of my section, and their voice comes to me as the vox populi, and I obey it. I obey it within the limits of the Constitution; I obey it now in voting to make these explorations; I obey it now in voting to put to work some of the young gentlemen that the nation has educated at West Point. It is a great deal better that these men should be studying these great problems than fighting Indians. They were educated by us, they are in the public service, and the truth is they have nothing to do. All your Army organization is a vast deceit to this country. We are at peace with the world and even at peace with the Indians, and the whole thing could be just as well abandoned as not. Put these young gentlemen, who are performing such arduous service on the frontier on paper, to making these explorations, and it will be better for them and better for us. Some one of them may develop great genius and become an honor to himself and his country if you give him the opportunity.

Mr. President, this subject is one of the largest that can be presented to this body, and one of the most important, in the first place, as involving the question of power. Do not forget that I am a strict constructionist and a State-rights man in the very strictest sense of that term, believing it to be the only system which will insure the transmission of this Government to distant posterity. Nevertheless, within the limits of the powers granted by the Constitution, I am for the exercise of those powers on an enlarged and magnificent scale in proportion to the greatness of the objects to be accomplished and also in proportion to the great nation whose work it is to accomplish those objects.

Now, sir, I would prefer that this preamble, which is rather too broad and illogical, without saying anything unkind of the gentlemen of the committee, did not exist, and I should like to vote for an amendment devised by yourself, Mr. President. I presume I would have to draw you from the chair for such an object. I would prefer to vote for that amendment, because it would secure to us the appropriation. There are gentlemen on this floor who perhaps do not feel at liberty to vote for this measure as a whole because it is the announcement of a principle which is at war with their honest convictions. No man respects such convictions more than I do. Therefore if the preamble could be stricken out and the resolution confined to an appropriation to make these explorations alone, I would much prefer it, because it may be that on a fuller discussion and investigation of this subject, I may be compelled to vote against these things for the want of power in the Federal Government. Yet that power is asserted in the preamble, and in voting for the whole proposition I should thereby give my assent to it. To exclude a conclusion, I now say that I do not denounce the preamble; yet if the resolution is not to be amended I shall vote for it as a whole, believing it to be to-day the greatest material question for the entire western country from whence I come, the greatest of all questions in a money point of view. I am bound to vote for the appropriation of $200,000 or whatever sum may be deemed necessary for this purpose. I repeat I would prefer to vote for the resolution without the preamble, and I think it would be but wise to strike out the preamble so that other gentlemen might be able to vote for the resolution.

Mr. President, I did not rise to speak at length on this subject. It was not my intention at any time before to have said one word upon it. I supposed that the resolution would be amended and then passed without discussion. We need these explorations. We need them even if the project of internal improvements by the Federal Government be abandoned. The information to be obtained by these scientific men will be worth every dollar that it will cost. Although we may not go on with the work ourselves, the information will be a benefit to States, to private corporations, and to individuals. Hence I say, let the appropriation be made, let these surveys be made, and next winter when we meet here again after these surveys are made we will take this subject up understandingly, and we will be able to discuss the question and determine whether the results anticipated by those persons who expect such great results, like this committee, will be realized or not. I repeat again that I have spoken longer than I expected. I have given expression to my views in a very desultory manner on a subject which I deem of the greatest importance of any that could be presented to this body in a material point of view. I will now offer the amendment of which I have spoken. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GORDON in the chair.) The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out of the preamble of the resolution commencing in the third line of the second paragraph after the word "competition," the words "under governmental control;" to strike out, also, in the same paragraph the words "to be created or improved by the national Government;" and in the last paragraph of the preamble to strike out, commencing in the third line, the words "and to enable Congress, at its next session, to enter upon the said system of improvements, if, upon the completion of such surveys and estimates, the same shall be deemed practicable and expedient."

Mr. BOGY. I will explain the amendment proposed. It retains bodily the resolution with the preamble, doing away with those portions only of the preamble which make this a Government matter or under Government control; that is all. It retains the provision that the surveys shall be made, that the great lines of transportation shall be made; but how they are to be made and constructed it leaves an open question for Congress to decide hereafter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am quite disposed to applaud the industry and the ability of this committee, and especially of the chairman, and his enthusiasm in relation to pushing this matter at the present session of Congress, and I am also disposed to vote for the proposition so far as the appropriation of $200,000 is concerned; but I desire to state that I shall do so with no purpose of committing myself to this gigantic scheme of internal improvement, costing no one knows what, for I presume it is not supposed by any Senator that if this scheme shall be commenced and carried through it will be completed at anything like the computation estimated by the committee. But I shall vote for it without believing that we are about to ordain and establish a great national system of internal improvements, but as a mere ordinary appropriation. We at every session grant appropriations for surveys at the mere request of some Senator; and shall we not, after a committee has made an examination of this extensive kind and proposes four grand routes to be merely surveyed, grant the poor pittance of learning the practical value of these several routes as well as their probable cost? I have no question but that an honest scientific survey of these several projects will explode at least two or three out of the four, perhaps all of them. We had probably much better survey them than to build them. We have heretofore made appropriations for the survey of the Isthmus of Darien several times, and yet we never have embarked in the scheme of water navigation from ocean to ocean across that isthmus, although we have spent considerable sums of money for the survey; and it is well to know that the thing is impracticable. Under these circumstances, while there are parts of this system that I would be almost ready to vote money for to-day in a moderate way, yet I would not be understood at all to be committed to any part of this grand scheme.

And now, Mr. President, let me say that there can be no solution of this question of obtaining higher prices for agricultural products by any scheme of cheaper transportation. The whole transportation must be avoided. New States without manufactures, distant from markets, cannot overcome the losses of the transportation account. It will always be a drawback. I mean that they cannot by any new scheme of transportation secure much cheaper rates than those now prevailing, and if it could be done, the producer would not reap all the profits, as the produce would be sold at a less price. The difficulty can only be overcome by progress and by the increased growth of manufactures. If gentlemen in the West will turn their attention to that subject and establish manufactures, so that they will consume the bread and meat at the door, making the consumer the neighbor of the producer, then there will be a solution of the question, and not till then. The grain-selling States are rapidly receding westward. Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and Missouri will soon furnish a market at home for all they produce.

In relation to railroads, I have a conviction with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] that a scheme for freight railroads alone would somewhat cheapen freights; and yet I do not desire that the Government of the United States itself should embark in the railroad business. I should be perfectly willing to grant a charter, but I would not have the Government undertake to furnish capital and run the road, because as a whole the railroads of the country are unprofitable, even when managed by private enterprise. I suppose that to-day, if the matter were examined, it would be found that three-fourths of all the railroads of the country are non-paying investments. They are vastly in debt, many of them crippled, and very few except eastern and western roads in fortunate locations are dividend-paying roads. But I have no question that there is capital in the country that would embark, if it could have a proper charter, in some large scheme extending from the Atlantic to the Mississippi. I would be willing to give them the opportunity and put the matter to the test; but so far as this resolution is concerned, I regard it merely as an ordinary appropriation for a survey that a committee of this body have decided to be of some importance. I think it will be developed that it is not of any very great practical importance, or that it will be too expensive; but I am willing that the resolution shall pass.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President, I had no design to enter into this debate, and would not do so now except for the positions just taken by some Senators among my party friends who have spoken in opposition to the resolution.

I do not understand that we are voting here to inaugurate a system of internal improvement or to plunge the Government into any vast scheme of building either railroads or canals. The simple proposition before us is to authorize an appropriation of money for the purpose of procuring information by surveys in regard to the feasibility of establishing thoroughfares through portions of the country to facilitate commerce among the States. Simply as such I regard it, and without giving any importance to the recitals in the preamble, simply as such I propose to consider the proposition on which I am called upon to vote. I find no constitutional impediment to deter me from advocating the measure, and I find no principle of the party to which I am attached that will prohibit me from giving it my favorable vote.

It is designed to counteract the mischief that has already been done by the vicious legislation that has too long prevailed here. We have built up a system of railroad monopolies by Government lands and money to such an extent that we are called upon by the voice of the people to give them some relief and protection. It is relief that the people demand against the vicious legislation that has prevailed and absorbed the Congress; by which individuals have been enriched at the expense of the many and the prosperity of the country. Subsidies by Government lands, bonds, and money have been bestowed with unsparing hand, by which certain preferred citizens have been enabled to build railroads at Government expense, and yet the Government—not as a parent watchful of the good of the national family—has not taken the precaution to put any provision in those vast subsidy bills by which it could exercise any control over the roads, or their owners, or any power to regulate fares or freights or to prevent extortions from the people. And in a great measure it is in consequence of this improvident legislation that we hear appealing voices from many portions of the country against that combination of aggregated capital which is rapidly retarding the development and prosperity of the nation. To counteract this, as an initiative, to afford a remedy against it, I presume this resolution of inquiry for purposes of future use has been introduced. As such, I am among those who deem it worthy of our favorable consideration; and in voting for it I wish it to be distinctly understood I do not intend to commit myself to favor the construction by the Government of either the railroads, canals, or other internal improvements foreshadowed by the preamble or the general report of the committee charged with the subject.

There is a question of constitutional power involved that addresses itself to me and perhaps to every other Senator, and that is the power the Government may have upon the subject initiated by this preliminary resolution. I find the provision in the Constitution, with which we are all familiar, that Congress has the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." I do not understand that the Congress has any more power to regulate commerce with foreign nations than it has to regulate commerce among the several States. The clause in the Constitution is the same in regard to each; and we know Congress does exercise powers in regard to regulating external and internal commerce by building, improving, and protecting harbors on the sea-coast and on the lakes; also by improving river navigation and various other internal communications within the States; and but a few days ago we passed a bill to purchase the canal around the rapids of the Ohio at Louisville. If we can appropriate money to improve internal waters and to purchase canals, the question might with some propriety be asked, can we not also build canals to facilitate commerce? If we can donate money and lands to build railroads, well may it be asked, can we not build railroads to regulate commerce among the States?

I do not undertake to say, neither does any one I presume, that commerce necessarily relates to water communication. It does not relate to a transportation merely by water. Commerce may exist by land transportation entirely. The Government, as all admit, may make an appropriation to improve the Mississippi River; but suppose some barrier by land exists by which communication between one State and another is prohibited, in that event would not Congress have the power to remove that land barrier in order to facilitate commerce between the different States? In point of principle it may be difficult to explain the difference.

I am not undertaking to argue that Congress may or may not build railroads in order to facilitate commerce between the different States; but I do say, so far as the grant in the Constitution is concerned, that there is no distinction, in point of power, that I can perceive, between regulating commerce among the different States and between us and foreign nations, or whether it be done by improved water or land facilities.

In my native State, New Jersey, where I formerly resided, years ago a charter was granted to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company and the Delaware and Raritan Canal and Transportation Company. It was a monopoly, an exclusive privilege. One of the conditions attached to the charter, as near as I can recollect, was that the company by way of a tax should pay ten cents per capita for every passenger that it carried through the State of New Jersey, and five cents per ton, I think, for all merchandise. That was not an impost exactly upon the commerce of New York, but it said to the people of New York, "In order to pass through the State of New Jersey to the State of Pennsylvania you must pay ten cents per capita, and in order to transport your goods you must pay five cents a ton." Now, suppose Pennsylvania imposed a similar tax, and Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, &c., did likewise, what would be the result upon commerce among the States? Suppose the tax, instead of ten and five cents, should be twenty or fifty or one hundred cents. If any taxing power exists in such cases it is unlimited, and if Congress has not the power to regulate it there is no power lodged anywhere able to correct an abuse if it should exist.

I might illustrate better perhaps by taking my own town of San Francisco. A cargo of tea arrives in San Francisco and the State of California imposes a tax, and I will put an extreme case to illustrate the point—a tax of ten cents per pound as a preliminary to the transportation of that tea through the State of California into the State of Nevada. When it arrives at Nevada another ten cents a pound is imposed. When it gets to Nebraska, to Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, each State says "For transporting this tea through our territory you must pay ten cents a pound." In that case it would amount to a prohibition, and yet that is exactly the case that was sustained by the courts in New Jersey in regard to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. The principle was tested before the courts, and the position taken by the company according to the provision in the charter was sustained. Take your chest of tea from the port of San Francisco to the port of New York, each State putting upon it whatever tax it sees fit to impose for the privilege of transporting it through its territory, and it would be unsalable to the consumer in New York so as to pay charges. The tax would be a positive prohibition to commerce between the States. And are we to be told that there is no power in the land to relieve internal commerce from a burden of that kind which may be imposed by the States through which it passes? If the power be not found in the clause of the Constitution regulating commerce among the different States, the power does not exist anywhere.

But, sir, as I said, I am not disposed to go into this matter to any very great extent. It does behoove us, however, to place ourselves upon the avenues and open the channels of trade, if we wish to be prosperous as a nation. I might mention in this connection, as our port of San Francisco is now in competition with other routes of transportation, that some years ago as I stood upon the shores of the Red Sea observing the construction of that great work, now fully completed, the Suez Canal, it occurred to me then that that was to be the great rival of San Francisco in controlling the commerce of Asia; and so it has turned out. Now a cargo of tea may be sent from China by the Suez Canal, landed at the port of New York, carried thence to the Mississippi Valley, to Saint Louis or Chicago, at less expense than it can be sent from China to San Francisco and transported to the valley of the Mississippi by rail. Further, a whaling-ship may pass by the port of San Francisco, come around Cape Horn to New Bedford with its cargo of oil, land it there, thence have it transported to Saint Louis or Chicago, at less cost than it can be landed in San Francisco and transported by rail to the valley of the Mississippi.

This is some evidence that we have not availed ourselves of all the opportunities that have presented themselves for placing ourselves on the avenues of trade. I do not say, for I am not sufficiently conversant with the facts, whether or no the railroad charges from the Pacific westward are in excess of other roads, but it must be remembered these roads (the Central and Union Pacific) were substantially built by the munificence of the people, and not by private capital; and yet the people have no control over them or property interest in them, and cannot avail themselves of them on account of cost for the transportation of their products and that which they consume. The people of the valley of the Mississippi cannot ship grain to the port of San Francisco, thence to be shipped to China or Japan, no matter what the demand might be, at the present rate of transportation. For that matter neither can they send by rail to New York to be shipped to Europe so as to compete with Russia. Unless some more advantageous carrying facilities, some cheaper mode of transportation be devised for delivering our surplus products at our sea-ports, Russia will soon be underselling us, not only in foreign markets, but even in New York and Boston. To prevent such a calamity is there no governmental relief? Are we entirely dependent upon the magnanimity of private enterprise? Then private enterprise, not the Congress, regulates commerce among the States.

Take the case of the Suez Canal. It has been built by private individuals. The governments of Europe, ascertaining that they were charging beyond what would be a fair recompense, had a sort of international congress, in which they demanded that the rates should be reduced; but the owners of the canal said, "No; we will not reduce these rates; the canal is our private property." The sovereign power of the Sultan and the Khedive was appealed to, and when it was found reasonable that the charges should be reduced, there was a sovereign power there that was competent to bring about the remedy that was required; otherwise commerce might have been driven from that canal to some other channels, but the nations in Europe found it important to control it. Before Vasco de Gama discovered the passage around the Cape of Good Hope, the commerce of Asia enriched all the cities upon the Mediterranean. Alexandria, Venice, Genoa, were so enriched and made magnificent by that commerce, overland commerce as it was. Trieste and Marseilles are now sustained almost entirely by that commerce.

After the passage around the cape was opened the transportation and trade of Asia were revolutionized, and those cities with the loss of that trade fell into decay and obscurity. Since the construction of the Suez Canal another revolution has taken place, and that commerce is being again restored to its former channels, and England is interfering to obtain a footing there, by which she can obtain the control. England never fails to obtain the control of commerce wherever she finds that it is advisable to do so. England now has the carrying trade of the world. Why is it? Not because we are not competent to do it, but because by legislation we have driven it from us and driven it to England. England is the money center of the world. They have no advantages over us in point of location. At the extreme north of the continent of Europe what are their advantages? They have not central location. It is by wise management on her part, sending her ships and her goods everywhere, commanding the trade of the world, making London the financial center of the world. It is by deep-laid management, by foresight, by brain-power that they have produced that, while we, legislating by high-tariff laws in order to protect individuals, have driven commerce—driven the carrying trade of the world from us; and in doing this we have protected and enriched a few manufacturers; but now under a protective tariff which amounts to a prohibition, our manufactories have increased to such an extent that there is not sufficient demand in the country to exhaust their products, and there is no market elsewhere. We have also the reflection that we have donated to railroad corporations a territory larger in area than England, and have no national advantages in return.

But, sir, I had no idea of getting into this channel of argument. But to go back; this resolution, as I said, is demanded by public sentiment. I believe that there is a public sentiment throughout the land that requires this legislation. You see it in the associations of of agriculturists, of laboring men, of mechanics, all engaged upon this subject. It is public opinion that is being formed, and we may as well understand here as elsewhere that in this day public opinion is all powerful. No monarch is so ensconced behind his battlements at this day but what it will make itself felt, and no Congress is so enshrouded by the panoply of power but that it will make itself heard. The people require legislation, not for monopolies, but legislation for themselves. And if we do not heed public sentiment as manifested by them and take some measures to administer relief to the depressed producing industry of the country, we will soon find our places filled by others less disposed to aggrandize individuals by subsidizing overshadowing corporations, and more devoted to the interests of the whole people and the general prosperity. This resolution is a movement in that direction. For this reason I am willing to give it my support and to take the risks as to what may follow when the Government is called upon to construct the works that are here foreshadowed.

I am in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to strike out the three words "under governmental control." I hope the Senator from Minnesota will consent to strike out those three words. They add nothing to the sense of the proposition.

Mr. WINDOM. I will explain again that I think this preamble is misunderstood by the Senator from California, as it is by my honorable friend from Missouri. The committee may have made a mistake, but this preamble does nothing more than recite the finding of the committee. It does not commit the Senator to this statement.

Mr. HAGER. I understand that.

Mr. WINDOM. It simply states that the committee report the following. That is in fact the report of the committee, and being their report, I cannot think of going back and changing their report by agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAGER. I thought perhaps the Senator would see that these words are not necessary to the strength of the paragraph, and taking out the words might remove some misconception.

Mr. WINDOM. I think they do add great strength to it.

Mr. HAGER. "Through competition and the operation of cheaper means of transit than are now provided" will be left. It may be that that means governmental or private competition. It leaves it open to either. Therefore to leave out the words detracts nothing from the paragraph.

Mr. WINDOM. The retention of these words excludes the idea suggested by my honorable friend from Illinois, that by building more railroads we can obtain cheap transportation through voluntary railway competition with each other, and shows that it must be something beyond the power of combination.

Mr. HAGER. I agree with the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. WINDOM. I should be glad to agree with my friend, but it would require a change of the report. The committee actually finds in the language here stated.

Mr. HAGER. I agree with the Senator that additional railroads will not cheapen transportation; on the contrary, I believe they would have a tendency to increase prices. For instance, take the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, between Washington and Baltimore. One road would do the business, but there are two, and by combination they arrange their prices in such a way that a revenue is derived on the whole capital invested in both roads. If there were three, four, or five the tendency would be to increase, not to diminish prices. Therefore I agree with him on the proposition that additional railroads will not cheapen transportation, but on the contrary may increase it.

Mr. BOGY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by me.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the passage of the resolution with a very slight amendment, of only a word probably. It is agreed by all that it commits no one as to his action in the future with regard to the construction of these works. It is an expression of the judgment of the select committee of the Senate, and the resolution specially says that in the judgment of the committee so and so is best. Then you will notice again that it is qualified at the end of the first "whereas" by this expression: "in case Congress shall act upon this subject," so that it is altogether left conditional.

I take it we all agree that this survey ought to be made. The whole country, in my opinion, demands it. It will furnish information that will be useful to base action upon in the future. It will certainly give definite, positive information to the country and to the Senate, so that in future anything that may be proposed to be done can be done intelligently under this survey. Large portions of nearly all the four routes that have been recommended by the Committee on Transportation have been surveyed. There is a small portion that has not been properly surveyed, and the want of that link prevents the whole chain from being connected. It occurs to me that some of these proposed surveys have been recommended by a commission appointed by one of the Departments to examine this subject, and they think that probably surveys are required to obtain information necessary to enable the country to form a judgment. As I think the resolution commits no one to further appropriations, and as it is qualified by the statement that certain measures seem best in the judgment of the committee without committing Congress to them, I see no objection to it.

I may say that I dissented, with some of my colleagues, from a part of the report, and probably if this resolution were not conditional I might dissent from part of it. But as I understand it is conditional, I shall support it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OGLESBY, (when Mr. LOGAN'S name was called.) I desire to say for my colleague, [Mr. LOGAN,] who is called away this afternoon, that if he were present he would support the resolution and would oppose this amendment.

Mr. BAYARD, (when the name of Mr. MORTON was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] Were he here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 14, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Boutwell, Cooper, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Lewis, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Ransom, Schurz, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, and Thurman—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator who has the resolution in charge that after the word "can," in the third line of the second whereas, he change the word "only" to "best."

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to that amendment. It substantially expresses the same idea.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON. Now, it is evident that the preamble has produced embarrassment in the minds of many Senators. It has nothing to do with the resolution. It is conceded on all hands that we shall look into the question after the survey shall have been made, and that no man is committing himself to it although it is here on the record. I move now to entirely disembarrass this resolution of this very troublesome preamble; and as we often drop a preamble in the Senate and pass a bill without it after it has accomplished the object of a preamble, I move to strike out the preamble down to the words commencing "Resolved."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves to amend by striking out the preamble.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not want to discuss it. I can only say that the preamble expresses the purpose of the resolution, explains it, recites simply the finding of the committee, and it seems to me it cannot be objectionable. I hope the preamble will not be stricken out.

Mr. TIPTON. After the preamble has accomplished the object of a preamble the resolution stands independent of it entirely.

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations—

It is a mere ordinary resolution of instruction to a committee—

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and hereby are, instructed to report amendments to the pending river and harbor bill making appropriations for completing the surveys and estimates for each of the improvements recommended by said select committee upon the four routes indicated in said report.

That resolution is as far separated from the preamble as the north is from the south pole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 25.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, were it not that so many Senators have avowed that their voting for this resolution would not commit them to the undertaking of the improvements enumerated, I should not have deemed it necessary to say a word; but, after so many avowals of that character, silence may be construed into an acquiescence in a committal to all the scheme of improvements. I simply rise to say that while I shall vote very cheerfully for the resolution as it stands amended, I shall not by that vote consider myself committed to vote for these improvements. I may vote for them if upon the survey they are found to be practicable and expedient, and the cost to be such that in the then existing state of the Treasury we can safely undertake them.

Having risen to say this much on the resolution, I will add one other thing. It seems to be taken for granted that it is the West alone that is interested in cheap transportation, cheap freights. I wish to say that in the East for many years there has been a very loud complaint that we have been suffering largely for the amount of freight that has been charged for the benefit of the West. Wheat has been shipped at Chicago and sent to New York at a less rate than the farmer in Western Pennsylvania could ship it and send it to New York. I do not mean at a less rate relatively, but absolutely; and so the other way, all the supplies that were used in the great West, were carried past the people in Pennsylvania at a less rate than they paid for getting it from New York and Boston into the interior of Pennsylvania; and as this agitation has commenced in the West, for whose benefit these cheap freights were imposed, I only rise to say God-speed to them, and go on, for they are doing the very thing which we the people in Pennsylvania have wanted done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I took occasion to say yesterday that I did not feel prepared to approve or disapprove the policy recommended by the Committee on Transportation, and for the reason that I had not had an opportunity to examine their report or properly consider the different questions involved in it. Since hearing the discussion which has taken place since that time and glancing hastily at the report, I am constrained to say that I feel called upon to vote against this resolution, and I desire now to state very briefly my reasons for such vote.

In the spring of 1873 the Senate provided for raising a select committee on the subject of transportation. That committee have discharged the duties devolved upon them——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator give way for a motion to adjourn, as it is late? If so, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the consent of the Senate the Chair will dispose of some business on the table before putting the question on that motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask as a personal favor, inasmuch as certain members of the Committee on Banking and Currency have had this matter more especially under their charge, I may be excused from serving on the conference committee.

The SPEAKER appointed as the managers of the conference on the part of the House Mr. FARWELL of Illinois, Mr. DURHAM of Kentucky, and Mr. MERRIAM of New York.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, submitted the following report:

POSTAGE ON NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS.

Mr. WOODFORD, by unanimous consent, presented the following petition; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed, and also ordered to be printed in the RECORD with the names:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned respectfully represent that a measure is now pending before your honorable body involving a modification of the present rates of postage on newspapers and periodicals and of the method of paying the same. While we concur on the importance of saving money to the Post-Office Department, we would respectfully suggest that in the interest of the people the rate of postage should be as low as would be compatible with the efficient working of the Department.

Understanding that the Postmaster-General will recommend compulsory prepayment of postage on newspapers and other periodicals at the office where mailed according to the weight of the mail matter delivered, and not according to the number of copies sent, we respectfully suggest that the rate should be fixed at one cent per pound on newspapers and two cents per pound on all other periodicals.

In view of the fact that under the proposed method of prepayment the whole of the postage money would be collected at a greatly lessened expense to the Department, we believe that the above rate, while it would be greatly to the convenience and advantage of the people, would insure an immediate and satisfactory increase in the revenue of the postal service. A higher rate would be unjust to the interests which will have to bear the whole burden of the change.

JUNE, 1874.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF GENERAL GREENE.

Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, called up the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Whereas the Continental Congress resolved, on the 8th of August, 1786, that a monument be erected at the seat of the Federal Government bearing the inscription, "Sacred to the memory of Nathaniel Greene, esq., a native of the State of Rhode Island, who died on the 19th of June, 1786, late major-general in the service of the United States and commander of their Army in the Southern Department. The United States in Congress assembled, in honor of his patriotism, valor, and ability, have erected this monument:" Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to designate upon the Capitol grounds a site for an equestrian statue of Nathaniel Greene, in conformity with the foregoing resolution.

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, no member of the House I think will object to the passage of this resolution. It directs the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to designate a site in the Capitol grounds for an equestrian statue of Major-General Nathaniel Greene, in conformity with a resolution of the Continental Congress passed in 1786, immediately upon the decease of General Greene, and while his services were fresh in the memory of the American people.

It is a slight tribute to the general of the war of the Revolution, who by common consent ranks next to Washington, for his eminent military services in the struggle of the Colonies for national life.

The resolution was concurred in.

Mr. EAMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FERMENTED LIQUORS.

Mr. LAMPORT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3590) to increase the tax on fermented liquors; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. LOWE. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Mines and Mining a bill (H. R. No. 2032) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, for action at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

COMMERCE.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. At twenty minutes after eleven o'clock the two hours assigned to the Committee on Commerce begin.

INLAND AND SEA-BOARD COASTING COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments a bill (H. R. No. 2179) to incorporate the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, in the first section provides that John W. Thompson, William G. Metzerott, Samuel Bacon, William Stickney, A. H. Herr, William B. Todd, J. H. Baxter, A. B. Stoughton, William Thompson, and their associates and successors, or a majority of them, be, and are thereby, created and constituted a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia, by which name said company may sue and be sued, may have a common seal, and generally may have and possess the rights and privileges usually possessed by similar companies.

The second section provides that the capital stock of the said company shall not be less than $100,000 nor more than $1,000,000, to be divided into shares of $100 each; and the said company is authorized and empowered to run vessels propelled by steam or other power between the cities of Washington, Georgetown, Alexandria, and New York, including the ports on the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay, and the tributaries thereof, and to prosecute a general coasting trade in the transportation of passengers and freight of every description, subject to the rules and regulations and laws of the United States; and the said company is also authorized to purchase, hold, and convey such real and personal estate as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of the act, and to purchase or construct such docks, wharves, and buildings as may be necessary for its own use. It shall not issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt to be used as a currency.

The third section provides that the affairs of the said company shall be managed by a board of directors, nine in number, who shall be stockholders, and be elected annually, and hold office until their successors shall have been duly elected and qualified; and the said directors, five of whom shall constitute a quorum, shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company; and the board shall also choose a secretary and treasurer, and choose or provide for the appointment of such other officers and agents as they may deem necessary. The board of directors may make such by-laws, rules, and regulations, not inconsistent with this act or the laws of the United States, as they conceive to be proper respecting the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company; and in case of a vacancy occurring in the board by death, resignation, or otherwise, the vacancy shall be filled by the remaining directors. No person shall be a director or president who is not a stockholder, and any person ceasing to be a stockholder shall cease to be a director. Every stockholder in the said company shall be individually liable for claims accruing against the company to the amount of stock he may hold therein.

The fourth section provides that the persons named in the first section of the act, or a majority of them, may call a meeting of the stockholders, for the purpose of organizing the said company, at such time and place as they may determine upon, after advertising the time and place of meeting for ten days in one or more newspapers published in the city of Washington; and at said meeting, and all other meetings of the stockholders, every share of stock shall entitle the holder thereof to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy. General meetings of the stockholders for the election of directors shall be held annually thereafter; and it shall be the duty of the directors to give ten days' notice of the time and place of holding such meetings by advertisement in one or more newspapers published in Washington; and all votes given for directors shall be counted and certified by a committee of stockholders who are not directors.

The fifth section provides that the act may at any time be altered or amended by Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit two or three amendments, after which I will ask the passage of the bill as amended.

The first amendment recommended by the committee was as follows:

Add at the end of the first section the following:

Provided, And this act of incorporation is granted upon the express condition, that nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the property of said Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company from taxation under the laws of the several localities in which it may transact its business.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I submit also the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "State," in the twelfth line of third section, insert "or the several States through which its boats may pass or in which it may transact business."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I submit also the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "States" in line 11, second section, insert "or the several States through which its boats may pass or in which it may transact business."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire simply to say that this company was organized under an act of the Legislature of the State of New York. Its stock is now owned here, with the exception of eighty shares out of the thirteen hundred, and the stockholders, with the exception of five, all reside in this city and desire to transact the business of the company here. The bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHEELER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECURITY OF NAVIGATION ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3379) for the further security of navigation on the Mississippi River.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to inquire into the expediency of causing shear-booms to be placed on the upper end of all bridge-piers on the Mississippi River, for the better security and convenience of the navigation of said river for rafts of logs and lumber; and if, in his opinion, it will better secure the navigation of said river, the bill further authorizes and directs him to require all bridge companies to place said shear-booms above the piers as the Army engineer having charge of said river may direct, the same to be constructed and maintained at the expense of such companies or bridge-owners.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT LA CROSSE.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the Committee on Commerce, reported, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3586) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of La Crosse in the State of Wisconsin.

The bill provides that the Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company may construct and maintain a bridge across the Mississippi River at a point heretofore selected by said company between the county of La Crosse, in the State of Wisconsin, and the county of Houston, in the State of Minnesota; provided that the Secretary of War shall convene a board of engineer officers, whose duty it shall be to ascertain and report whether a bridge at the location selected by said company can be constructed and maintained without material interfence with the security and convenience of navigation of said river at that point, and shall also ascertain and report what accessory works it will be necessary to construct and maintain to secure the best practicable straight channel-way for navigation of said river at and near that point; the board shall further determine the necessary height of said bridge, the location of its piers, and make such recommendations for the security and convenience of navigation as may be deemed essential and proper; and upon the approval of the report and recommendations of the board by the Secretary of War, the said company, upon being so notified, may proceed to construct said bridge in accordance with said report and recommendations, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the town of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, and other bridges across said river, and to establish them as post-roads," approved April 1, 1872; and provided further, that said company shall construct and maintain all the accessory works found to be necessary as hereinbefore provided for the security and convenience of navigation at their own expense, and subject to such supervision as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and that until the said works shall have been constructed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War, and are approved by him, the superstructure of the bridge shall not be commenced; and provided further that this act shall not be so construed as to relieve said company from the provisions of any existing laws, except as to the location and height of said bridge; and provided further that said company shall not charge more than three dollars a car for each freight-car transported across said bridge.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question. If I remember correctly there has been a contest about the location of this bridge and some trouble in regard to it between the companies interested. I wish to know if these difficulties have been harmonized and if all parties agree to the present bill?

Mr. SAWYER. There has been an arrangement made satisfactory to a majority of them.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to make a further inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] before the vote is taken. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Commerce have had under consideration the propriety of providing by a general law for the building of bridges across the Mississippi River? Every session nearly for at least the last ten years we have had contests here about bridging the Mississippi River. We have also had some about bridging the Ohio River. But so far as the Ohio River is concerned, there is now a general law which provides for the building of bridges generally. I wish to ask why we should not also have a similar provision at least in regard to the upper Mississippi River, so that we may be relieved from these constantly recurring contests.

Mr. SAWYER. There are two classes of bridges on the Mississippi River. And, as the gentleman from Indiana states, there is no general law applicable to them. We only take up the applications as they are made to us. This bill was referred to the Chief of Engineers with other bills in relation to bridges which have been introduced. He fully approves of it, and this is in fact a substitute drawn by him. I think there can be no objection to the bill.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to repeat my question, why we should have a general bridge law for the Ohio River and not for the Mississippi River?

Mr. SAWYER. The reason that we have no such general law in regard to bridging the Mississippi River is that there has been no bill of that nature introduced and sent to the Committee on Commerce. I do not know that it is our business to originate such legislation. If the gentleman will introduce such a bill and have it referred to our committee we will consider it.

Mr. NIBLACK. It seems to me that the propriety of such a policy is so obvious that the Committee on Commerce would themselves have originated a law of that kind.

Mr. CONGER. There is nothing to prevent the bridges across the Ohio coming under one general rule. Those across the Mississippi have to be built according to locality, as the height of the water varies a great deal. A general law in regard to bridging the Ohio might very easily be made, and such a law might also be made in regard to a part of the Mississippi but not the whole of it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think this is a case where we should have a general law. Let us have general legislation applicable to all these bridges, so that we may get rid of these contests every session of Congress about bridging the Mississippi River.

My object in seeking the floor was to call the attention of the committee to the necessity of general legislation on this subject, and to invite the attention of the country to it also so that we shall not every year be called upon for special legislation in reference to bridging the Mississippi River.

Mr. SAWYER. If the gentleman will introduce a general bill upon the subject I will endeavor to get the attention of the Committee on Commerce to it. I now call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER. This bill extends the life-saving stations along the southern coast—the coasts of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Florida; also the Pacific coast and the lake coast. It adds twenty-two to the number of complete life-saving stations, twenty-four boat stations, and five houses of refuge. In regard to the importance of these life-saving stations on the lakes, I wish the Clerk to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES REVENUE MARINE,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1874.

SIR: Referring to my statement yesterday before your committee that the disasters to shipping on the great lakes for many years past have been very numerous and serious, I find upon examination of such imperfect statistics as I have been able to collect that I have the names of 4,527 vessels which have been wrecked upon said lakes within the last ten years. The number of lives reported as lost from these vessels is 1,341, and the loss of property involved foots up $27,370,062.33.

You will observe that my estimate of the annual expense of maintaining the service at the new stations recommended does not make provision for the employment of a superintendent upon the Pacific coast. This was omitted because the stations upon that coast are so few and are so located that it is believed that the captains of the revenue cutters upon that coast can perform, under the direction of the Department, the duties which would devolve upon a superintendent without interfering with their duties as officers of the revenue service.

At one or two of the localities named for stations upon the Pacific coast, which are somewhat remote from settlements, it may be found necessary to employ for brief periods crews to man the life-boats. I accordingly submit a substitute for section 5 of the bill prepared under your direction for your consideration, as to the expediency of its adoption in lieu of the section as it now stands.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. I. KIMBALL,
Chief Revenue Marine Division.

Hon. SAMUEL HOOPER,
Chairman sub-Committee of Committee on Commerce,
House of Representatives.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a word in support of this bill and in favor of the extension of this life-saving service. I have watched with considerable interest and anxiety this system. My interest begins with the first appropriation for the Jersey coast. The Globe will furnish, in my previous advocacy an excuse for my present interest. From its introduction into this country to the present time I have taken almost a romantic interest in it. It has proved a perfect success. Will gentlemen read the report made by the Chief of the Revenue-Marine Bureau for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873? It shows the operations of this service. They will be astonished to see the benefit which it has contributed to our commerce and the great saving of human life effected by this remarkable phase and refinement of civilization.

The report shows that the wrecks which occurred since the date of the last annual report upon our coasts where stations were in operation numbered 32; the number of lives imperiled was 235; the number of lives actually saved, 234—only one life lost; the number of shipwrecked persons sheltered in station-houses was 33; the total number of days' shelter afforded 77; the total value of property imperiled $832,230; the total value of property saved, $581,201; the total value of property lost, $226,029. Since the introduction of this life-saving service on the coast of Long Island and New Jersey, which was begun in this House under great difficulty and under the prompting and urgency of my friend General Haight, then the member from Monmouth, New Jersey, and in spite of considerable opposition, there have been some 4,300 lives in all saved, besides an immense amount of property.

A great deal of time and labor has been expended both by engineers and others in experiments as to the best kind of life-boats and the best life-saving apparatus. There has been a vast improvement in the manner of reaching vessels stranded and imperiled. Those who are familiar with this new service know that when a vessel comes within two hundred or three hundred or three hundred and fifty yards of the shore and cannot be reached by the life-boat, plans have been invented and adopted which, by means of a mortar and a rocket and a line, it is possible to attach to the ship the line and start a car so fixed upon that rope as to bring people and property safely to land; sometimes a life-boat that will right herself and free herself from water, to be used on shoals or at points beyond the mortar or rocket. I wish that I could read a handsome résumé from the correspondent of the Journal of Commerce of September 1, 1873, of this modus operandi. I can but refer to it. Some experiments were made last year at Narragansett station. The cutter Grant was selected, Captain Slicer commanding. The drills are had; the rocket party is organized; the cart and apparatus are ready; wiz! and buzz! and the tentative shots are fired! The elevation is ascertained, the distance measured, and the line now and then fouls; but again and again is the trial, until both the English and the American apparatus are tested, successfully often, and so successfully that with the American invention the rocket is fired at twenty-five minutes after twelve o'clock; the shot goes between fore and main-mast; it falls ten yards beyond the ship; the line is lodged in the stays. A two-inch line is hauled aboard by the rocket line. Then the life-car is fixed and starts. It is hauled back and forth with its precious and periled freight. In thirty-one minutes from the firing of the rocket the first man is saved. The car holds four persons. Forty persons saved to the hour—grown persons; eighty children. God bless the ingenious humanities which lead to such results!

If I had time I might show more in detail how within such short time and with such appliances so many precious lives have been saved.

But, Mr. Speaker, is there need to say anything more just now in behalf of this bill, a measure involving not only the saving of valuable property but the preservation of human life?

To the extension of a system so beneficent there can scarcely be objection. Our strictest thoughts of economy melt before such kind effects. This bill asks an appropriation of only eighty or ninety thousand dollars, I believe.

Mr. CONGER. Forty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. COX. I am corrected in this: that the call is $45,644, as follows: Atlantic coast, $9,904; Florida coast, $4,000; Pacific, $4,280; lake coasts, $21,460; contingent, $6,000. The statement or estimate I gave was over $87,000. It referred to the cost of maintaining this service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, as I read from the report of Kimball, exclusive of the amount expended in construction and establishment of new stations was $87,893. If this system is perfected and extended to all the dangerous points on our coast—and upon so extensive a coast as ours there are numerous points of danger—incalculable benefits will result with very little comparative expenditure. I congratulate myself, Mr. Speaker, that amidst the general uselessness of much of our legislation in which I am often compelled to take a negative part here, this one object, free from partisan prostitution, tends to the exaltation of our better nature and the sanctity of human life.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I heartily sympathize with the object of this bill; but I want to call the attention of the gentleman reporting it to sections 10 and 11 which seem to be matters that do not relate specifically to the object of the bill so far as I can judge from reading them, but which provide, as I understand, that in any case of accident to a vessel by collision or otherwise, involving a loss of life or property, the master of the vessel shall report the case to the collector of customs under a penalty. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] whether he deems these sections at all essential to the purposes of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. They seem to me very essential in order to secure the obtaining of statistics, and the keeping a record of marine disasters. These provisions which entail no great trouble upon anybody, will enable the Treasury Department every year to make up a report of the losses of life and property by shipwreck and other accidents. The same system exists in England; these provisions are copied from the English law.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I can see that there may be some benefit from the keeping of these statistics; but generally speaking I object to anything that imposes needless restrictions or penalties upon our merchant service.

Mr. HOOPER. The penalty is very small.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The penalty of $100 upon every master of a vessel who does not report any little accident.

Mr. HOOPER and Mr. PARSONS. Any material accident.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Maine will remember that it is very important that Congress should know from time to time what points are most liable to accident involving loss of life or property; and this bill seeks to provide a method by which this knowledge may be accumulated in the Treasury Department, so that we may know where accidents are most liable to occur, and where these stations are most needed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I suppose that is the reason why it was put in here.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say further the committee have taken those points where, from information and report, the greatest danger heretofore has seemed to exist, and where the greatest and most immediate necessity for these stations at present prevails.

Mr. HOOPER. I call for the previous question.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will see by section 10 that of accidents involving loss of life or material loss of property or serious injury to any person, a report shall be made within five days after such accident or damage to the collector of customs of the district where such vessel belongs, and this will enable Congress to be fully informed on the subject from year to year.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am afraid the result will be that masters of vessels will not realize what are the operations of this law.

Mr. PARSONS. The penalty is small.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Gentlemen of the committee who have looked into the matter of course are better able to judge than I am.

Mr. HOOPER. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEEPENING THE CHANNEL AT THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. STANARD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3595) to provide for deepening the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

The first section authorizes the Secretary of War to advertise for proposals to deepen the channel at any one of the passes of the mouth of the Mississippi River by dredging or otherwise; which proposals shall specify the price at which the party proposes to secure twenty feet depth and not less than two hundred feet of width of water throughout the channel of one of the passess or outlets of said river into the Gulf of Mexico at ordinary flood-tide, so that vessels drawing twenty feet of water may be navigated through said channel; and also the price per month that the party agrees to maintain said depth thereafter for a term of five years. Said proposal shall also specify the price that the party agrees the Government shall pay him for each and every foot in depth over and above the twenty feet in depth which he may secure and maintain, up to and including twenty-seven feet in depth.

The second section provides that on the receipt of said proposals, in answer to said advertisement, the Secretary of War shall be authorized to contract with the lowest bidder, who shall furnish evidence satisfactory to the Secretary of War of his ability to perform said work, and also satisfactory security for the performance of the same; provided that such proposal shall not call for more than $150,000 for securing the said twenty feet of depth, which amount, or the proportion thereof to which the successful bidder by his contract shall be entitled, shall be paid to said contractor when said depth has been maintained six months, nor more than $15,000 per month thereafter for maintaining said depth, nor more than $3,000 per month for each and every foot maintained over and above said twenty feet in depth. And the money necessary to enable the Secretary of War to enter into, execute, and comply with the above contract is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided that the contract shall cease at the end of ninety days' notice by the Secretary of the Treasury that it has been superseded by any other work of improvement.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. STANARD. This subject has been under consideration by the Committee on Commerce, and I have been instructed unanimously to report it. It simply provides that this shall take the place of the dredging now in operation by the Government and that the appropriations which are being made for the Mississippi River shall be used in this manner, and the contract shall be made with the lowest bidder, not to exceed the sum of money provided for in the bill, which is less than the usual appropriation for the last several years for the work which has been done.

It is provided that twenty feet of water shall be procured before any money shall be paid, and shall be maintained for six months before any portion of the $150,000 shall be paid. By the operation of the dredging system, which has been in operation for five or six years, they have not been able to obtain more than eighteen or eighteen and a half feet of water, and much of the time not more than fifteen feet of water. It is also shown by the report of the engineers that not more than forty-six or forty-eight days of the past year have really been employed in the work. It is the desire of the Committee on Commerce, who have considered the subject at length, and the desire of many of the merchants and others who have been before the committee, that for the amount which is expended certain results shall be accomplished and that no money shall be paid until certain results are accomplished. It has been represented to the Committee on Commerce there are plenty of men in the country who are willing to take this contract and assure the accomplishment of this depth of water before any money shall be paid to them. Hence the committee in order that these results may be accomplished, paying no more money than has been annually expended heretofore, ask for the passage of this bill. It in no way interferes with the bill which is now being considered, reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals. It will be observed there is a provision in the bill in case a contract shall be made in accordance with its provisions, if the river should be improved by jetties or canals and the necessity for this work should be superseded by the construction of other works, then the contract under this bill shall cease on ninety days' notice from the Secretary of War.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether this work will conflict with the construction of the jetties if the Government see proper to enter into a contract to have the jetties constructed?

Mr. STANARD. It is not so considered.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to ask a question in regard to the effect of this bill. I observe that it makes an absolute appropriation for the amount of this contract. Is it anticipated that this will require any other appropriation than the usual annual appropriation for improving the mouth of the Mississippi River?

Mr. CONGER. It is not. This is intended to take the place of the usual appropriation for deepening the mouth of the Mississippi River until some permanent work is undertaken.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If it is to be expended in the coming fiscal year, there will be no need for the usual annual appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. The appropriation for the coming fiscal year will be made in the river and harbor bill, but this work is to be commenced six months afterward; and the appropriation here will supplement that appropriation at the end of that time, taking the place of the Government work.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My difficulty was that I did not see how the two could go on at the same time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WELLS. I ask that the bill may be again read.

The bill was again read.

The bill was passed.

Mr. STANARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE H. DENNIS.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of George H. Dennis, no adverse report having been made in the case.

H. W. REYNOLDS.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of H. W. Reynolds.

WRECK OF THE SHIP PATRICIAN.

Mr. CONGER. I am instructed to report back from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. No. 614) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the ship Patrician, near the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco, California, and to move that it be laid upon the table. There is an appropriation in the river and harbor bill for removing this wreck. If that should pass, it is all that is necessary. I move that this bill be laid on the table, and at the same time enter a motion to reconsider in case the appropriation to which I have referred should fail.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was agreed to, and the motion to reconsider entered.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 3421) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1875, returned from the Senate with an amendment, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2887) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. COX. I desire to reserve the point of order on this bill.

The SPEAKER. It is reserved until the bill is read.

The bill was read.

It provides that it shall not be lawful to bring any vessel or vehicle coming from a foreign port or country, and affected with a contagious or infectious disease, or conveying persons, merchandise, or animals affected with contagious or infectious diseases, into any port of the United States, except under the regulations hereinafter provided.

The second section provides that the Surgeon-General of the Army, the Surgeon-General of the Navy, and the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service are hereby constituted, ex officio, a board to make the regulations to be observed by persons controlling vessels or vehicles coming from foreign ports or countries into ports of the United States, by passengers upon and persons connected with vessels or vehicles so coming, and by pilots at the several ports of entry, to the end that no persons, animals, or goods affected with infectious or contagious diseases may enter the United States. And said board may prescribe the times, manner, and places of performing quarantine by vessels, vehicles, persons, animals, and goods coming from foreign ports or countries, and may make all needful rules and regulations not inconsistent with law, and alter and amend the same, for the efficient execution of the purposes of this act; but no rule or regulation, or amendment to the same, shall have effect until approved by the President. The board shall make report annually to the Congress at its meeting in December. Said board shall organize within thirty days after the passage of the act, and establish the rules and officers for its own government.

The third section provides that there shall be detailed or assigned by the President, from among the commissioned medical officers of either the Army or the Navy, or from among the surgeons of the marine-hospital service of the Treasury Department, to be selected without regard to rank but solely with reference to skill and experience in hygiene and public sanitary science, one who shall be the secretary to the above board, and shall in addition, under the direction of the board, be charged with the supervision of all matters pertaining to the establishment and maintenance of the system of quarantine provided by the act.

The fourth section provides that for the execution of the duties arising out of this act medical officers of the Army or of the Navy, or surgeons of the marine-hospital service of the Treasury Department, may be detailed or assigned, according to the exigencies of the service, with especial regard to economy and efficiency; but no person in the employment of the Government, detailed or assigned to duty under the provisions of this act, shall receive any additional compensation therefor; and the President of the United States shall issue such instructions to the officers of the various Departments of the Government, not interfering with their peculiar duties, as shall secure the aid and co-operation necessary to perfecting and enforcing the regulations provided for by the act.

The fifth section provides that any person willfully violating the provisions of the first section of the act shall, upon conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $500, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, at the discretion of the court; and the circuit courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under the provisions of the act.

The sixth section provides that the provisions of the act shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment and maintenance by States or municipalities of health regulations and quarantine measures, in addition to or furtherance of and not conflicting with the system constituted by this act; and such local systems and their appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities.

Mr. BROMBERG. I enter a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. COX rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] propose to debate the bill?

Mr. COX. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Alabama does not propose to debate the bill, I do.

Mr. BROMBERG. This bill in its present form is reported with the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Commerce. I listened to the gentleman from New York with a great deal of pleasure in his advocacy of another bill which came from that committee, and which received the strongest support from him on the ground that it saved human life as well as property. I hoped that the very reasons which made him support that bill would also have induced him to support this. For there is no bill which has been laid before this House which is more calculated in its provisions to save human life than the very bill now before the House. This bill, as well as the other supported by the gentleman from New York, was carefully considered in the committee, was carefully matured, and comes here now for the ratification of the House. The subject embraced by this bill is one to which I believe almost every member of this House has given careful consideration, for it has several times been presented to them for their ratification.

Mr. Speaker, my subject is very large, but I shall discuss it in some of its narrowest aspects, and with greatest brevity compatible with a plain statement of them.

A national system of quarantine is prayed for in memorials from Pensacola, Mobile, New Orleans, and demanded also by the citizens of Galveston. The people of the entire Gulf coast are in fact united in requesting the interposition of national power to protect them, and through them the entire Southwest from the terrible visitations of imported plagues. The National Board of Trade, composed of merchants from all parts of the Northeast and West, at its meeting at Chicago last October also indorsed a proposition looking toward the same end.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the South do not come here with any fancied grievance, nor are they so in love with the national power that they would resort to it as a cure for any evil they may labor under had not sad experience shown not only the necessity of such appeal, but also demonstrated why the remedy lies in the national power alone.

The birthplaces of yellow-fever, so far as the United States are concerned, according to best opinions now, are in Cuba and Mexico. At those points the disease is an annual visitant; but its type varies from year to year in greater or less malignancy. Our entire Gulf coast is within two or three days' sail of both of those points, and communication between it and them is frequent and continuous. The vehicles of this intercourse are chiefly freight-vessels carrying no passengers, but simply merchandise. It is conceded by all who are familiar with the yellow-fever, that the holds of vessels and the freight contained in them are the most effective nurseries for the germs of this fatal disease. At the same time the fact that such goods or vessel may be infected is utterly beyond human perceptions until actual contact with them has developed the fearful consequences. Our Gulf cities are therefore annually threatened. At the same time they are in perfect ignorance whether the enemy has entered or not. They know nothing definite of the actual health status of Cuban and Mexican ports. They cannot, because as ports of mere States, destitute of foreign relations, they are without the means of obtaining certain knowledge.

That being the case, and the fever being annual and native in the countries named, it may be asked why do not these Gulf cities have permanent quarantines against those homes of epidemics and not come here to Congress for protection.

The question is natural to those not thoroughly conversant with the workings of quarantine, but the answers are few and simple.

First. Quarantine regulations are always restrictive of commerce and submitted to with great reluctance by those having charge of vessels and by merchants. Nothing but impending danger at any time renders them tolerable.

Now, for reasons about which we are wholly in the dark, the fever as it occurs in its birthplaces does not each year possess equally malignant character. It makes its regular appearance, but prevails frequently only in a mild type. In that form it is either not easily transmissible, or is unable to attach itself so tenaciously to things as when it comes in epidemic form. Two or three years may therefore elapse in which a quarantine becomes almost wholly useless in our southern ports, and commerce gladly avails itself of the excuse to demand entire exemption from the restrictions imposed by it. It is granted and no ill follows.

But, second, there is but little use for one place along the line to adopt stringent measures unless every other does, and at the same time. A sanitary line is like one in military operations, as strong only as its weakest point. It is almost wasted effort for one port to maintain rigid quarantine unless its neighbors do the same. And if but one neglect its share of the common duty, all that the others do is rendered null. Our sea-board cities are no longer, as at the formation of the Union, isolated points upon a long-stretched coast, having no populous country back of them; but, through railways and steamboats and the systems of through cars for freights and passengers, have intimate commercial relations with each other and the whole interior, and are practically within a few hours reach of them. It is simply disheartening to any place, after guarding itself in the best possible way from the entrance of disease by sea, to find its labor and money wasted because of laxity or ignorance at some other port, hundreds of miles off, in another State, utterly beyond its control, but with which there is more than daily communication by rail or boat.

Third. The same reason makes quarantine upon the southern coast by local authorities ineffectual, for want of uniformity in time. The best of protective measures have little value if adopted too late. But each port decides the question of time for itself, and as each desires to put off the adoption of quarantine to the last moment, and none desires to be ahead of its neighbor, lest trade be diverted from itself to that neighbor, it follows that there is always the one weak point described in my second reason, arising from the simple cause of tardiness.

Fourth. The question of local jealousy plays a prominent part in making effective local quarantine systems in the South impracticable. We have seen that fever does not assail us in the South every year although it constantly menaces us. The scourge is held in extreme dread by all classes, and by none more than those who dwell in the interior. The mere rumor of the appearance of the disease at any place is sufficient to destroy utterly the trade of the suspected point. As matters stand, no place can proclaim quarantine without giving rise to the suspicion that some vessel has already brought cases of the infection into the port, and the instant effect is that not only do strangers avoid the town, but its own people take the alarm and abandon it. So certain is this to happen, and so much dread does it cause southern business men, that it leads to a concealment—short-sighted, if you please, but none the less the fact—of even the first cases of fever at the commencement of any outbreak. Consequently no port will be the first to proclaim a quarantine, for the reasons given, and each watches its neighbor to see what happens to it before acting. Where all strive to be last some one is sure to be too late; and through that point, as through the weak point in that Massachusetts dam, destruction pours in upon an entire section of country. That these are not imaginary consequences the official reports made by the medical staff of the Army, referred to in Report 392, bear abundant testimony. In 1873, Montgomery, in the heart of Alabama, was infected through Pensacola, on the coast of Florida; Memphis, in Tennessee, through New Orleans, hundreds of miles below, in the State of Louisiana; in this, simply repeating the history of a hundred years.

Fifth. The poverty of the Southern States will for a long time prevent their sustaining perpetually the burdens of an efficient quarantine. We have seen that years may go by without any visitation of yellow-fever. At any event it threatens us only during the summer. In winter, owing to the smallness of our general trade, and especially that of passenger movements, we are almost beyond apprehension of danger from any quarter during the colder months. The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the injunction of Justice Bradley in the case of Morgan vs. Peete, arising out of the Galveston quarantine system, and declared similar charges levied upon vessels for the maintenance of the quarantine system unconstitutional as a tax on tonnage. The States and ports are therefore remitted to their own resources. As nearly all of them are practically bankrupt, the result will be that all measures will relapse until it becomes a matter of life and death with each inhabitant to do something, and that will be too late to protect the people at large in the country in communication with that port. I have information both from New Orleans and Galveston that such will be the result at those points. In the case of New Orleans my authority is the secretary of the chamber of commerce, Judge W. M. Burwell; in that of Galveston, the health officer in a letter to Representative WILLIE.

The reasons given for the inefficiency of the present local quarantine systems in the South are such as clearly to demonstrate that the remedy can be found only in a national system. Of the five, one only is based upon a purely local condition, that of poverty. A long line of coast, embracing largely identical climatic peculiarities, is yearly exposed to an exotic malady. It very clearly follows that for its protection measures uniform in method, uniform in time of operation, and, above all, founded upon exact knowledge of the sanitary status of the West India Islands and of Mexico, are needed. Uniformity in methods demands one set of devising brains. Uniformity of time requires an exercise of a power outside of and above the individual ports, prescribing the rules for the agents of the whole people, independent of local rivalry, local indifference, and local helplessness. Certainty of knowledge respecting the danger to be guarded against can only be had by the General Government through its foreign relations. The outside world knows nothing of individual States. It holds no intercourse with them, does not recognize them in any way. Were the States to appeal to it for aid in this matter by the communication of such information as would enable the local health authorities to act intelligently, they would undoubtedly be coldly remitted to the national agents as those alone through whom a State could be treated with. The General Government alone can secure for the States the information upon which they can act intelligently in sanitary matters.

Will any one admit the truth of these propositions and yet declare them to be of chiefly theoretical value? And if he admits their practical value, can he avoid giving his co-operation toward some measure or other looking to putting them into effect? What more terrible demonstration of the necessity of instant action can be had than that made by the experiences of the past summer, (1873.)

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA.

Through inefficiency at Pensacola, in the State of Florida, Montgomery, in my own State of Alabama, nearly two hundred miles removed by rail, was visited again for the first time in eighteen years by the terror of the South. The city had been placed in best sanitary condition, under apprehension of an attack of cholera, which had approached with fearful force within a hundred miles, and which had been successfully warded off. What could our people know, however, of the silent entrance in another State, in a distant port, of the infected ship Golden Dream? Or if they did, by the exercise of what power could they have remedied the deficiencies of the quarantine there? Surgeon Sternberg, United States Army, in a report made to the Surgeon-General of the Army, (Executive Document No. 85, House of Representatives, Forty-Third Congress, first session,) says there was not a physician upon the board of health at Pensacola. The vessel was detained but not disinfected. The difficulty was that no one knew positively that she was infected, for no one knew the actual condition of Havana whence she had come.

As before stated, the existence of the first cases of the yellow-fever is almost invariably concealed in any southern place in which they occur, and it consequently happened that the disease was transplanted to Montgomery from Pensacola coeval with the public acknowledgment of its existence in the latter place. Montgomery had absolutely no warning, but was taken by the throat as it were, completely off its guard.

What were the results? Not eighteen hundred whites were left in the city out of over five thousand. The rest fled. All business came to a stand and the place was completely deserted. Out of the eighteen hundred whites remaining, between four and five hundred sickened with the fever and not less than one hundred died, including some of the most valuable and prominent citizens. My authority is Dr. R. F. Michel, a medical authority second to none in any State.

SHREVEPORT AND MEMPHIS.

Who has forgotten the harrowing tales that came to us from Shreveport and Memphis? Did not the whole country respond with generous hand to the appeals that were made by those sadly stricken towns? In the former place nearly every person sickened, and eight hundred died. In the latter the full details have never been fully given, and it seems as if the authorities had sought to forget the awful history instead of collating it. Fully two thousand persons must have died. And it is to be remembered that in this slaughter it is not the aged or the thriftless, or the diseased, but of the young and strong by preference, and of the best blood of the city.

So with Shreveport and Memphis, the fever came from New Orleans. (See annual report of the supervising surgeon of the marine hospital service for 1873.) It was brought into New Orleans by the bark Valparaiso, in July, from Havana, according to Dr. C. S. Russell, secretary of the board of health for that city. I might add it was brought into my own home, Mobile, from New Orleans also. It is an established fact (page 58, Senate Executive Document No. 9, Forty-second Congress, third session, report of Harvey A. Brown on yellow-fever) that, although the yellow-fever had long previously made frequent visits to New Orleans, it never passed up and attacked the towns that lie along the Mississippi until the introduction of steamboats on that river, and in 1873 a steamboat was the vehicle for transporting the germs of the fever both to Shreveport and Memphis. I doubt, however, whether the authorities of either place were aware that any such source of infection as the Valparaiso had slipped into New Orleans. Certainly the authorities of New Orleans, true to the practice of all our southern cities, never blazoned the fact abroad to destroy their trade by the alarm it would inevitably have caused.

Had there been a national system of quarantine, its officers, did they do nothing else, would have saved thousands of lives in 1873, at each of the inner places; perhaps have been instrumental in wholly preventing epidemics there, by timely notice to the whole country that there was danger and warning all to put their houses in order. We did the latter early at Mobile, being governed by experience and having officials who had the capacity to anticipate and guard, and we succeeded in almost completely beating back or stamping out such germs as managed to enter our lines; but even we were guided more by our apprehensions than by any positive knowledge of an actual danger. Our escape was narrow and the city suffered to the amount of thousands of dollars through the annihilation of business and the stampede of a large part of its people.

While asking for national action I can assure the House that we shall not in the South relax our efforts to guard ourselves by all means in our power. The law of self-preservation governs us as effectually as it does the world everywhere. Let a danger be clearly pointed out to us, and the constitutional tendency to protect himself must be first utterly rooted out of the temper of the southerner, before we shall sit tamely and idly waiting for others to defend us. No one need apprehend that we shall throw upon the national Government the entire burden of a quarantine. Our own lives and those of friends and kin are as dear to us as those of the people of the North and East to themselves. But we have seen all our best efforts to protect ourselves thwarted by want of powers which were surrendered by the people to the General Government. Without the aid of these powers we are utterly helpless, and we only ask such exercise of the common authority as shall lend us, as it were, the powers we as individual States stripped ourselves of for the sake of forming this Union.

We want, above all, the national Government through its foreign relations to advise us of the condition of the foreign ports with which we trade; that it advise us of the approaching danger; that it see to it that our gates are all shut at the same time; what is better, prevent the infected vessel from even coming up to the gate by forbidding the approach of such as are known to be dangerous; by fixing common places of rendezvous for all vessels coming from infected ports, no matter to what point on the coast they may be bound, thus concentrating all risk at one isolated spot instead of, as at present, allowing it at as many points as there are ports of entry. Finally, we want the national power to go out upon the high seas, and prescribe sanitary rules and regulations for the government of those controlling vessels. No individual State can do that.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is my plain statement of our grievances and our wants in the South and Southwest, and certainly it is a strong one and our views of the remedy. It convinced your Committee on Commerce, and I am sure must convince every one who has not some private cause for resisting conviction.

Mr. Speaker, the bill proposed by the committee is simply an extension of the customs regulations. I now withdraw the motion to recommit the bill, and ask the previous question upon it, and if it shall be sustained I will then yield half of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. After this tender of courtesy on the part of the gentleman from Alabama, I do not like to object to the call for the previous question; but I know that there are gentlemen here from the city of New York and from other coastwise cities who want to be heard upon this subject. I think that the House could well afford to allow some debate upon a matter that concerns the whole commerce of the United States. I do not wish to accept the gentleman's kindness at the expense of my constituents or of just legislation. I hope the House will vote down the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROMBERG. I understand that the gentleman from New York declines to take the floor under the arrangement I have suggested.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Alabama if he will accept an amendment to his bill, and if that amendment is acceptable to him I shall make no special objection to the bill. I ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk, and in explanation of it I will say this to the gentleman, that he has assured the House that this bill does not interfere with municipal, State, or local regulations in respect to health; that it is not the intention of the law to interfere with State regulations—long-established regulations. My amendment will meet that exactly, and with it I will vote for his bill. If he intends otherwise, then I shall ask the House to vote on my amendment.

Mr. BROMBERG. I will hear the amendment read. I understand the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. It has been; but it is in the power of the majority to reconsider the previous question and incorporate any amendment they desire.

The amendment was read; to strike out section 6 of the bill and insert the following:

That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to apply to the health regulations and quarantine measures maintained by States or municipalities; and such local systems and their appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities.

Mr. BROMBERG. If the gentleman will withdraw his objection to the bill, I will accept that amendment.

Mr. COX. I will do so.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] what demand there has been for the passage of this bill? Has there been any complaint from New York, Philadelphia, or elsewhere of the present quarantine regulations?

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the sixth section of the bill which it is proposed to strike out be read.

The sixth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment and maintenance by States or municipalities of health regulations and quarantine measures, in addition to or furtherance of, and not conflicting with, the system constituted by this act; and such local system and its appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities.

Mr. MYERS. I asked the gentleman from Alabama a question. If he expects us to vote for this bill (I will not vote for it myself) he should let us know what necessity there is for its passage.

Mr. BROMBERG. I have already explained the necessity for the bill. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for the sixth section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. I see no necessity for the bill.

The question was taken upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time; and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Mr. CREAMER. I call for a further count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROMBERG and Mr. CREAMER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 96, noes not counted.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I have no opportunity upon committees to aid in the maturing of legislation on matters vital to New York City, for I am on no such committee. But even when an inland member, I always felt an interest in commercial and urban affairs somewhat unusual to one born near fresh water. I have endeavored to be true to my promise, when last nominated for Congress. I promised to give more attention to business and less to mere politics than formerly. It is not my fault if I have not been as useful as I have been vigilant. The opportunity has not offered. I often think I see here a morbid legislative hostility against New York City which is not shown in ordinary business, commerce, or other relations of our American life and society. I feared that this bill was framed in this spirit. The acceptance by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] of my amendment relieves my apprehension somewhat.

While, therefore, I may not like the general tenor of this bill, I am willing, in the danger which I have observed in former contests on this bill, to save the admirable systems in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, and other States—to close the controversy.

This bill was framed originally, however, so as to challenge the attention of all our coast cities and all places in connection by rail or water. It originated in a joint resolution of Congress of June 6, 1872, requiring a report as to a more efficient system of quarantine for the Southern and Gulf ports. That report is before me, (Executive Document No. 9, Forty-second Congress, third session.) The inquiry was intended to be local. It grew out of the yellow-fever invasions, and as usual with such reports, the result, but for my amendment, would be a new Bureau or commission, overturning all the best legislative local guards of the past.

This report and the bill of the committee seems to be framed in the interests of health and commerce; but it is only seeming. On its face it appears a reasonable bill and well intended. The gentleman from Alabama has explained it in a gentle spirit. It was, however, liable to serious objections when introduced. These must excuse my persistent opposition during this session.

Section 9, in connection with the preceding section, originally, made it a felony for a quarantine officer to act under a State or local law if that law conflicts with this law; and this section brought up the whole question of local or Federal jurisdiction on health matters.

This question is not a new one to courts or to Congress. It has so repeatedly been passed on by the United States courts, that it seems strange to have it again brought up. In 9 Wheaton's Reports, (Gibbon vs. Ogden, page 18,) the opinion of Webster is found, that "quarantine laws * * * * may be considered as affecting commerce, yet they are in their nature health laws." The Attorney-General, Mr. Wirt, also said, (idem., page 178:) "With regard to the quarantine laws and other regulations of police respecting the public health in the several States, they do not partake of the character of regulations of the commerce of the United States." Chief Justice Marshall delivered the opinion of the court. (Idem., page 203.) In the matter of inspection laws, quarantine laws, &c., he says:

They form part of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government; all of which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves.

In the case of The City of New York vs. Miller, (2 Peter's Reports, page 133,) Justice Barbour cites this opinion, and includes it in the opinion of the court. Congress has recognized this principle in the law passed February 25, 1799. (Brightly's Digest, page 810.)

A remarkable feature of the original bill was that by it Congress empowers a board of three officers to make laws (section 3) on this subject, violations of which would be a misdemeanor subject to fine and imprisonment even if the offending person was carrying out a State law which violated the provisions of the Federal law made by this tribunal, and that, too, after the United States courts have decided that the power to make these laws is with the States. I do not care to discuss the question as to whether the power is concurrent or not. It is enough for me now that my amendment reserves all local rights.

Further, the powers granted in the original bill so unreservedly, were greater than ever granted to any quarantine board in this country. They were empowered (section 2) to establish and enforce such rules and regulations as they shall deem necessary to prevent the importation into the United States of infectious diseases. This, without specifying what are infectious diseases. At the port of New York, which has two-thirds of the commerce of the United States, the present quarantine system is the most perfect and least burdensome of any in the world. At that port quarantine is limited to four diseases, cholera, yellow-fever, small-pox, and ship-fever; yet this law till amended, gave the right to three men to make laws which would detain vessels having any contagious or infectious diseases, such as scarlet fever, measles, or, if they choose to stop them, ships having venereal disease or the itch; and the merchants owning these vessels would have no means of redress except to call on this tribunal, not responsible to any locality for their acts—living at Washington—to reconsider their oppressive laws and make other laws more liberal.

The case previously mentioned might have occurred on just this point: A State quarantine officer would have been guilty of misdemeanor and punished with a fine of $500 and two years' imprisonment for permitting a vessel under a United States law, with scarlatina, to proceed, should we give this Federal health board the right by this bill to make a law saying that they should be detained.

The principle of the bill was wrong. Even if the United States courts had not decided these quarantine questions to be local matters, common sense teaches that, of necessity, they are so. The quarantine regulations of Portland, from natural causes, are very different from those of New Orleans, and these again are different from those of San Francisco. New York, with her large commerce, and immense immigration, has an entirely different class of wants, and these are extensive and imperative, and such as only can be known to those who reside there. Yet this bill as originally proposed gave a board in Washington the power to make those local laws, with all their necessary details for each place; and these are to be considered good and valid if the President approves them. Besides giving this Bureau this great and fearful power, thus abdicating the legislative function, it ought to be made omniscient, in order to be competent to wield them. Its members should be secured long life, lest their successors might not be such good and able men. In that case they would abuse such power. When, therefore, I protested so often, with too much feeling and earnestness, perhaps, against the apparent wish of a majority, who seemed to desire this bill, I am justified now, to-day, by the adoption of the amendment which leaves the bill comparatively harmless. Am I not also justified in giving, after the transaction, the reasons for this opposition? I would have been derelict had I not protested against the delegation of power under that bill, because we could not and should not delegate it in derogation of local rights and interests. It is easy to create Bureaus, but every one knows it is next to impossible to discontinue them or to control them. I feared that this law would, unless restricted, prove the entering-wedge to Federal usurpation. If it should leave local interests intact, I shall not be sorry to see some relief given to the Southern States in their destitution and chaos.

New York has just completed in all its appointments a perfect quarantine establishment. It has no equal. It has cost nearly two million dollars. Nor will it be deemed unjust to those who know General Dix's appointee, Dr. Vanderpoel, to say that it is conducted on principles quite as liberal, and at the same time as much in compliance with recognized hygienic laws, as any which could emanate from Washington.

The Journal of Commerce, in a clear and sensible article, expresses better than I can the advantages of local laws for this purpose. In its issue of May 13, 1874, it says:

> There is no way to estimate the value of quarantine methods save by results. Theory in such things is worthless. The results of the existing systems, in force at the port of New York and other places, are highly satisfactory. Last year not a single case of yellow fever or cholera entered this city, although many vessels arrived in our waters with those diseases on board. The watchfulness and skill of Dr. Vanderpoel, it is claimed, held the terrible assailants at bay. And so at all the chief ports of the United States, the local laws administered by local officers successfully repelled infectious and contagious maladies. The quarantine cordon was so complete, that not a solitary case of yellow fever or cholera could be traced to importation. In no respect could the Federal Government surpass the efficiency of the State authorities; and the reason of this is not far to seek. The people of New York, like those of Pennsylvania, Louisiana, and every other State having large ports, have the greatest possible interest in excluding epidemics from their soil, and may be depended on to spare no pains or money to secure themselves against those visitants. The interest of the General Government in the matter is but secondary. With every respect for the professional talents of the three Washington doctors whom it is proposed to put in charge of the national quarantine system, we think we can more than match them with medical skill of our own, already familiar by long experience with the quarantine needs of New York. And on other grounds besides those of the public health the Government system would be objectionable. At present, every facility for the transaction of business, consistent with the general safety, is extended to merchants and shippers by the local quarantine officers. This could not be expected to continue under Federal management.

For the first time in twenty years all collisions between commercial and sanitary interests have been harmonized. I am glad that the interests of the great port of New York City, jeopardized by introducing this disturbing element, are not, in consequence of this amendment, to be affected by the passage of this amended bill.

Certainly the action of the General Government in relation to matters connected with the collection of revenue are not such as to inspire confidence. Would it be more fortunate in regulating matters pertaining to public health by farming out either the executive or legislative function in contravention to domestic institutions?

There must be accord of action between quarantine and local health boards. Is it reasonable to suppose this would be attained unless local boards are left free and independent? Quite the contrary.

Moreover, I warn gentlemen South and North, who left us so often in a minority on this bill, on the three several Monday two-thirds votes, that State independence and State rights, properly considered, were then and are always involved in these and similar measures. I have often expressed my surprise that the few who voted with me on the preliminary votes against this bill—in its obnoxious form—were not of the State-rights and strict-construction party. It was a marvel that at first only some thirty votes could be mustered against the original bill. With such votes and sentiments, where will be the limit to Federal interference? How impotent the decisions of the highest courts are to estop such reckless legislation? We hear much of the Slaughter-house cases, decided during the December term of 1872. They are quoted in vain; yet I presume to quote again and again, to remind you of what Mr. Justice Miller said, speaking of inspection laws passed by the States:

> They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which controls everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government—all which can be most advantageously administered by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

We should be thankful, therefore, in view of the reckless disregard of judicial opinion on questions as to the dividing line between State and Federal power, that the sixth section of this bill is stricken out, and the amendment proposed by myself leaves unmutilated and in full force every municipal and State regulation as to health and quarantine.

Mr. POTTER. I do not believe the House understands the effect of this bill. I would like to have the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. BROMBERG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAMAR. In accordance with the notice which I gave on yesterday I now propose to call up for consideration the report of the Committee on Elections in the contested-election case, from the State of Louisiana, of Sheridan vs. Pinchback.

Mr. HURLBUT. I suggest to the gentleman to give way to-day to the pending bill for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, and to take Monday after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Say Monday at one o'clock.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If that can be done by unanimous consent I will not object.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. ELLA P. MURPHY.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3596) for the relief of Mrs. Ella P. Murphy, widow of Patrick Murphy, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HENRY WARREN.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the same committee, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3597) for the relief of Henry Warren for losses sustained by reason of the capture of wagon trains and other property by Indians in 1871; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution, which was read, considered, and adopted:

> Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House what title the present occupants have to the lands upon which the mineral springs, known as the Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas are situated; and also, if the title to said land is not in the United States; and if so, what legislation, if any, is necessary to enable the Government to take possession of the property.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a report upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

TAXATION OF SAVINGS-BANKS, ETC.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate has returned, with a single amendment, House bill No. 3574, explanatory of the act of June 20, 1864. The bill relates to savings institutions. I ask that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment was to insert after the word "dividends," in line 11, the words "on stock not exceeding at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum;" so that portion of the bill will read:

> Provided, That all the profits of such savings-banks, less the aforementioned dividends on stock not exceeding at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, are divided among the depositors, &c.

No objection was made, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISBURSEMENTS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. STRAIT, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, a bill (H. R. No. 3598) defining the compensation to be allowed for the disbursements of moneys expended in the construction of public buildings; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims a bill (H. R. No. 3599) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed with the accompanying report, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SYPHER. I call for the regular order—the bill for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. GARFIELD. There are two or three Senate amendments to the Military Academy bill. I hope the gentleman will allow them to be acted on now.

Mr. SYPHER. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropria tions to report back the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875. There are but two or three small amendments; and the committee recommend that they be concurred in.

The amendments were read, as follows:

On page 4, at the end of line 4, insert:
Provided, That the Secretary of War may assign one of the judge-advocates of the Army to be professor of law.
On page 5 strike out lines 6 and 7, as follows:
For renewing furniture for academic section-rooms and offices, $1,000.
On page 5 strike out in line 12 "15" and insert "20;" so that the clause will read:
For continuing the superstructure of the new hospital for cadets, $20,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire what is the object of the first amendment?

Mr. MARSHALL. It is to authorize the assignment of a judge-advocate of the Army to be professor of law at the Military Academy. That duty is now discharged by the chaplain, upon whom there are other duties devolving: and it is believed that a judge-advocate of the Army would be a more suitable person. The proposition has been recommended by a member of the Board of Visitors of the academy; and in the judgment of all who are acquainted with the subject there is great propriety in the suggestion. It adds nothing, I believe, to the expenditures of the Government.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. MARSHALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3342) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HURLBUT. In accordance with what I understand to be by usage my right as having charge of this bill on behalf of the committee, I yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. SYPHER. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Two or three days ago the arrangement was made that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] a member of the committee, should yield his time to me.

The SPEAKER. Not for the purpose merely of correcting the mistake of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.] but lest the case should grow into a precedent, the Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois who reported this bill has the right to make the opening speech, and also the closing speech, but he has no control over the floor intermediately—none whatever.

Mr. HURLBUT. But the etiquette of the House has always been, as I understand, that members of the committee should be first heard.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; not however by direction of the chairman of the committee, but by direction of the Chair.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I propose to occupy the floor in place of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR,] a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has noticed a growing tendency on the part of gentlemen in charge of bills to say when not actually holding the floor that they yield to this or that member of the House. But such a practice is not in accordance with the rules.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That is not the point that my colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] is making. He is proceeding on his knowledge of the fact that the gentleman from Kentucky gave his time to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LEWIS] desired to address the House first this morning. The Chair looked for him on the intimation of the gentleman in charge of the bill; but he was not in his seat. The applications to address the House on this bill are so numerous that they cannot all be accommodated in hour speeches.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But, Mr. Speaker, the point I make is this: it is the universally recognized right of the chairman of a committee to speak first; and in my experience here it has been the universal practice also for any member of a committee, not desiring himself to speak, to take the floor and yield it to some other gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois does not state the case quite correctly. Suppose that a committee make a unanimous report, then the members of the committee speak alternately with gentlemen opposing the report.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman of the committee [Mr. LEWIS] who was to speak now was to speak on the opposite side I believe to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ARTHUR.] I propose to speak in place of the gentleman from Kentucky in favor of the canal project as against the jetty system. This arrangement was made some days ago, and has been well understood among members of the committee.

Mr. SYPHER. The House knows nothing of that arrangement. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SYPHER] now claiming the floor represents a district immediately interested in the question and introduced the bill on which the discussion takes place. He certainly by some right of courtesy has a peculiar claim to be heard.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I presume he has; but I presume the members of the committee also have the right to be heard. I took means to be heard by obtaining the place which would have been occupied by the gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the committee. Had I not relied on obtaining the floor by this arrangement, I should have sought to be recognized by obtaining the eye of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes very much to accommodate the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen who desire the floor; but if the previous question is to be called at four o'clock, only four gentlemen, occupying an hour each, can speak upon the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But I submit to the Chair that if the member of the committee whose place I take were here he would be heard in preference to any one not a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the Chair thinks so. The gentleman from Illinois knows the custom which has grown up, not quite within the rule, but grown up in practice, the gentleman of the committee who does not desire to speak farms out his time to another gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is not that practice universal?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. All I ask is that the contrary shall not be enforced to my prejudice on this occasion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits to the House, if the arrangement the gentleman from Illinois now desires to have enforced be adopted, it will exclude the gentleman from Louisiana from addressing the House at all.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not understand it so.

The SPEAKER. It will certainly be so.

Mr. SYPHER. If the gentleman had allowed me to proceed I would have been through before he gets done with this discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman in charge of the bill desires to call the previous question at four o'clock.

Mr. STANARD. I did not know there had been any general agreement as to the time when the previous question is to be called.

Mr. CONGER. I took the usual precaution to have my name presented. I wish to speak in some order. I believe I have the next chance.

Mr. SYPHER. I desire to proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LEWIS] says that each gentleman should speak for half an hour, and if that arrangement shall be entered into that will accommodate all conflicting claims for the floor.

Mr. SYPHER. I will try to get through in half an hour.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman is recognized for that time.

[Mr. SYPHER addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HAWLEY, or Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that in a matter of so much importance as this the friends of this measure are so much divided as to the proper mode to be adopted to improve the navigation of the Mississippi River at its mouth. I have no doubt that a very large majority of this House is in favor of adopting some method that will secure a speedy improvement of the mouth of that river, and that shall open it to the largest class of sea-going vessels. I am sure every gentleman living in the West, the Northwest, and the South, or near any of the rivers tributary to the Mississippi, will appreciate the importance of Congress proceeding at once to adopt and carry out some plan that will secure the object we all so much desire.

I think I may say that the project of improving the mouth of the Mississippi River by means of jetties is a new one in Congress. So far as I know it is a proposition presented for the first time at rather a late day in the present session of this Congress. I think I may say further that had not that proposition been advanced, before this time a bill would have been passed by both Houses and become a law, providing for the construction of a canal for the purpose desired.

I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who believe that the only proper method, the only safe one to be adopted to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River is by the construction of a canal. In view of all the evidence which has been presented to my mind, I cannot doubt for a moment that the plan of improvement by means of a canal is entirely practicable. In 1871 Congress authorized and directed surveys to be made for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not it was feasible to construct a canal for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi. Those surveys were made by Captain Howell, a distinguished and able engineer of the Government. After the survey was made the Secretary of War instituted a board of engineer officers for the purpose of canvassing that proposition, of examining the survey, and reporting to Congress as to the feasibility of the proposed plan. That board consisted of seven officers, who have been for a life-time trained in their profession, men well known to the country, and in whom the Government and the people have great confidence.

The board unanimously report that the canal is a feasible project, that it can be constructed at a reasonable cost, and that when constructed it will answer the purposes of commerce in all the future. That report is plain and unequivocal, and it seems to me such as ought to satisfy any gentleman who is simply seeking for the truth; it ought to satisfy every one who is simply seeking to find the most feasible and the most certain method of improving the mouth of the river. It is true that one of those engineers says that he believes the jetty plan may succeed. At the same time, however, he concedes that the canal is perfectly feasible and practicable. I desire for a moment to call attention to the language of this board in their report to the Chief of Engineers. When speaking of the canal and its practicability they say:

The conclusions formed by the board may be briefly stated as follows, namely: From the facts and data presented in official reports and otherwise, from the experience gained on works of the same character, and the many improvements made in the practice of hydraulic engineering within the last twenty-five years, but, more particularly and pertinently, from the character of the borings made by Captain Howell upon the Fort Saint Philip Peninsula, across which the proposed canal is to run, the board is of the opinion that no extraordinary engineering difficulties in the construction and maintenance of the canal need be apprehended.

In that report the board unite in saying that there is no serious engineering difficulty to be met. The land through which the canal is to be constructed is of a sufficiently substantial character to warrant the construction by the Government of the canal for the purpose of securing the object desired. So far as I know, no engineer, either Government engineer or civil engineer, has reported that the canal may not be a success. I take it then as settled that the canal is a feasible and safe proposition; that the Government may undertake it with safety; that it may be constructed within a few years, and that when constructed it will accomplish all the results desired for the purposes of navigation.

It also appears that the expense of the canal will not be such as ought to deter Congress from undertaking its construction. It is no greater than might be anticipated of such a great work. It is a great undertaking, whether we undertake to improve by jetties or by the construction of a canal. It seems to me that Congress can with greater safety rely upon the opinions of engineers in the service of the Government than it can upon opinions of gentlemen outside of and not at all interested in the success of the Government, but rather in their own pecuniary success.

The engineers who have made these surveys, under the direction and by the authority of the Government, have no interest whatever in misleading either Congress or the people. They have simply a sworn duty to perform to the Government. It is their duty to make these surveys, and upon them to make the estimates which in their judgment are proper for the purpose of accomplishing the work desired; when that duty is performed their work is ended. So that they have no motive whatever to mislead Congress; and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the history of the Engineer Department and of the War Department in the past has been such that Congress may with confidence rely upon their opinions and their estimates. I know of no great work which they have ever undertaken which has failed. I know of no great work which they have ever undertaken which has been insufficiently done. I know members of this House and the people of the country will bear me out in the statement that the officers of this Department have uniformly shown skill, sagacity, and competency for the duties with which they have been respectively charged.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in opposition to the plan it is proposed to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River by jetties. It is proposed to so confine the waters of that great river within a narrower space that the bar which has been formed at the mouth of the river shall be carried out into greater depths, or into some imaginary current which is supposed to exist in the Gulf, and thus be carried away as some say even to the far-off Atlantic coast. This proposition is maintained by Captain Eads, a noted engineer. I have nothing to say against him. It appears from all the testimony which I can gather that Captain Eads, while he is a great engineer, is not at all familiar with this subject of the currents and what is necessary for improving the mouth of the Mississippi River. These gentlemen engaged in the Engineer Department of the Government of the United States are men who have not only been trained to their profession, but many of them have spent long years in the service of the Government, and have been largely engaged in making soundings and surveys about the mouth of the river and in the Gulf of Mexico. Chief of these I name General Humphreys himself, a man unsurpassed certainly as an engineer—a man who has risen through all the grades of his department until he has come to be Chief of the Engineer Department of the Goverment—a man who has won his place by service and by merit, and who many years ago spent years with his assistants in making necessary surveys and soundings at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Now, General Humphreys is of opinion that the project of improving the mouth of the Mississippi River by jetties is not at all feasible or practicable. General Humphreys says that that upon which Captain Eads and his friends depend for the success of their enterprise, the existence of a littoral current at the mouth of the Mississippi, is wholly unknown. He states in a report which he made to Congress at this session that there is no littoral current whatever at the mouth of the river, and in this opinion he is sustained by the whole board unless we except General Barnard.

Captain Eads and his friends concede that unless it can be established that there is a littoral current, or a cross current, or a shore current, or whatever you please to call it, at the mouth of the river, the improvement by means of jetties cannot and will not succeed. Captain Eads says that this current exists; some of his friends say that it exists; but every officer of the Engineer Department, so far as I have been able to discover by careful examination, except General Barnard, says it does not exist. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it cannot be an open question whether or not such a littoral current does exist. If it is to be found there in sufficient strength either near to or far from the mouth of the river, the fact can be readily ascertained by surveys and soundings. Sir, I submit in all candor to every gentleman on this floor that if this littoral current exists or ever has existed in the Gulf of Mexico, how does it happen that for hundreds of years the mouth of that river has been gradually carried out into the Gulf? If that littoral current existed in the Gulf of Mexico as it is claimed to exist, it would long ago have cleared the mouth of the Mississippi, and the bar never could have formed at the mouth of the river.

It is said that at the mouth of the Danube jetties have been constructed and the work has been a success; but, sir, the fact is as well known as that jetties have been constructed, that there is a strong littoral current at the mouth of the Danube where the jetties are placed. No man denies it; Captain Eads admits it; and it is because such a current does exist that jetties have proved a success. I would like to have any gentleman who may follow me in this debate tell me why it is that if a littoral current is to be found in the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the Mississippi, it does not to-day, or has not in centuries past, cleared the bar away?

The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] who addressed the House last night, stated that deep water is now found at a distance much nearer the bar than it was found years ago; yet General Humphreys states in his report to Congress that the water is now much more shallow from the bar seaward than it was in 1838, when the former accurate survey was made. For the purpose of calling the attention of the House especially to this matter, I wish to read a short paragraph from General Humphreys's report upon this subject:

He says:

Upon examining the map of the recent soundings of Captain Howell, we find that at the crest of the present bar of the Southwest Pass there was in 1838 a depth of one hundred and twenty-five feet. We also find that where in 1838, at the distance of thirteen thousand feet seaward of the bar, there was a depth of one hundred and forty-five feet, there is now only a depth of forty-five feet, (this point where the depth is only forty-five feet being three thousand feet seaward of the crest of the bar.)

I call upon every gentleman in this House to notice that at the time the accurate survey was made in 1838, at a point where the water was then one hundred and forty-five feet deep, it is now but forty-five feet.

Where, then, I ask is this littoral current that is to carry the sediment from the great river around the Atlantic coast, as is stated by Captain Eads it may be carried when his jetties are completed?

I read further from the same report:

We find, further, that this bar is now being extended annually into the Gulf in water not so deep as the bar was advancing in in 1838. We find, also, that from the crest of the present bar to a depth of one hundred feet the distance is now eight thousand feet; whereas in 1838 from the crest of the bar to one hundred feet depth the distance was forty-seven hundred feet; and we find, further, that from this point, where there is now one hundred feet depth outward for the distance of some eight or ten miles, the deposit made on the bottom of the Gulf between 1838 and 1873 is between sixty and seventy feet thick, or at about the rate of two feet per year.

He says further:

The opinion has been expressed by some engineers, in discussing the question of the application of the jetty system to the entrance of the Mississippi River, that the earthy matter of the bar and the earthy matter held in suspension will be pushed out by the jetties so far that a littoral current, which is supposed by them to exist outside the bar, will carry this earthy matter away from the approach to the entrance.

They seem either to forget or not to know that the greater part of the earthy matter held in suspension, which is brought to the crest of the bars, is deposited between the crest and points from five to ten miles directly seaward of them and in the direction of the mid-line of the pass prolonged, which direction the current of the river maintains after it passes over the crest of the bar.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be observed General Humphreys says the water, when carried out from the jetties or by the natural outlet as it now exists, is carried directly forward far into the Gulf, and as he states in another place, carried from twenty to twenty-seven miles directly seaward before it comes to rest. If this littoral current is to be found, how is it the water, when it passes from the river into the Gulf, is carried directly seaward?

Further, as to this littoral current, he says:

In the case of the mouths of the Mississippi River, even at the mouth of the smallest pass, the quantity of both kinds of deposit matter is enormous, and there is no littoral current to carry the suspended matter away. Even if there were at the mouths of the Mississippi a littoral current of the force of that existing at the Soolina mouth of the Danube, (the most careful observations have, however, failed to detect the existence of any at all,) it would be utterly impotent to cause any material modification of the bar formations.

I wish also to call attention to the fact that it is abundantly established by the engineers who made the surveys at this point that there is not more than a foot more depth of water on the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi River at high water than at low water, showing that the sediment carried is so great at high water notwithstanding the accelerated speed of the current the river is not able to carry it away.

Now, the friends of the jetty system say that the increased current caused by the construction of the jetties would carry the sediment so far out to sea that it would be lost in the flood of waters. Yet, sir, here is a standing fact that in high water, when the river is at its flood, there is but a foot more of depth on the bar than at extreme low water. That is stated, I believe, by all the engineers of the Government who have had experience in making these surveys and soundings at the mouth of the river.

I desire to call especial attention to another fact, and that is this: why the Mississippi River at its flood, when its water is carried so far out to sea, does not carry the bar farther seaward. The reason is this: when the water of the river goes out to the Gulf it comes in contact with the salt water, and the salt water, being of greater specific gravity, is moved but little if at all by the action of the fresh water coming in contact with it, because the fresh water of the river passes over the salt water of the Gulf. That is why the bar is not removed farther from the mouth of the river. It is not that there is not rapidity of current when it comes to the Gulf, but the fresh water meets the salt water as it is borne out to sea and passes over it. That which creates the great obstruction at the mouth of the river and causes the bar is the heavy material which is rolled along the bottom of the river. The coarse material of the river which the river in its course is not able to hold in suspension when it comes to the salt water is stopped and not carried farther to sea, and cannot be to any considerable extent by any process you may adopt. All the reports on this subject show that to be true. It must be clear to the mind of every one that the river to any considerable extent, after it leaves the channel within which it may be confined, cannot carry with it beyond the salt water the heavy material which is rolled along the bed of the river and which forms the bar.

I wish to call attention to a paragraph in the report of General Humphreys, in speaking of the difficulties of removing the bar. He says:

> The second is the ascertained fact that, where the fresh-water current of the river meets the salt water of the Gulf, the fresh water rises upon it, and creates a dead angle of salt water on the seaward side of the bar; and when the earthy matter pushed along the bottom of the river arrives at this point, the fresh water having risen from it, there is no longer any pushing force to keep the earthy matter in motion. It remains in the still salt water, forming an accretion to the bar. Its upper surface lies along the slope, on which the fresh water moves upward upon the salt water, which repeated measurements upon the bar of the Southwest Pass prove to be (on that bar) a slope of one foot in a thousand. It can make no difference whether the river current be moving at the rate of four feet, three feet, or two feet per second, when it reaches the point where it rises on the salt water, the matter pushed along the bottom will come to rest in the still salt water substantially at the same point.

Showing clearly as he does by his report the reason why this bar is not carried farther seaward. Now, the theory upon which these gentlemen go to explain the jetty system is, that by extending the jetties out into the Gulf they will carry the bar so far that it will be carried into deeper water where it will not be in the way or be felt, but will strike a littoral current which will carry it round the coast of the Atlantic. On that point I call the attention of the House to a remark in a pamphlet by Captain Eads which has been placed before the House. He says:

> The Gulf Stream sweeps around the Gulf, entering by the Carribbean Sea, and emerging with great velocity by the Florida capes, follows the North American coast to Newfoundland. It passes not far south of the mouths of the Mississippi, and it is not impossible that, with an accelerated current from the passes, after completing the jetties, it may distribute the mud of Missouri and Illinois on the coast of the Carolinas and New England.

Now I hope that no New England gentlemen will go for this bill upon the supposition that they are going to get all the deposits from the Mississisppi, the Missouri, and the Ohio Rivers carried round so as to be placed on the poor lands of the East as a fertilizer. I think they will be disappointed if they do. For my own part, I should be very glad if that could be done. We can very well dispense with it, and it would certainly be a great advantage to New England.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] in his speech last night said, in discussing this question, that a large part of the wash of the river is already carried to the shores of Newfoundland and even to Ireland. It is odd, Mr. Speaker, that if the mud that has been carried from the mouth of the Mississippi has been carried as far as Ireland there should be now so much of it that we cannot get rid of it by any process known to science.

I now desire to call attention briefly to what is said by the engineers who made the surveys to which I have referred, and the reasons why, as they say, the jetty system can never be made successful. They say:

> This yearly progress of the bar demands a corresponding extension of the jetties into deep water opposed to the severe storms of the Gulf, and consequently of great cost.
> The difficulties at the mouth of the Mississippi, so far as concerns the improvement by jetties, resolve themselves into three sources:
> 1. The absence of a littoral current.
> 2. The yielding nature of the banks and shoals.
> 3. The abundance of deposits.
> The first and third combine in the yearly and rapid extension of the bar, and compel the works of improvement to continue at a heavy annual cost until their entire abandonment.
> The second makes their construction difficult and their maintenance improbable, unless deeply founded at a very heavy expense.
> All the principal objections to the improvement of Pass à Loutre necessarily apply to the Southwest Pass.

I will now read a paragraph from the report of General Humphreys on the same point.

Mr. GLOVER Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. Do I understand the gentleman correctly as saying that the board of engineers say that the jetties are impracticable?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do say so. They say that they cannot be constructed. I read to that effect from the report of the engineers——

Mr. GLOVER. There is here a letter from General Humphreys which has been laid upon our desks within the last ten minutes, in which he says they can be constructed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I was about to refer to the opinion of General Humphreys. I have read the opinion of the board of engineers, and they give the reasons why the work cannot be done, why it is not practicable to do it in that way; and they say in another place that this is because they must be continually extended. I was about to call attention when interrupted to what General Humphreys says on this point. I read from the report which I have already cited the language of General Humphreys, as follows:

> The conclusion is inevitable: the jetties must be extended annually at the same rate that the bar is advancing if we intend to maintain permanently the same depth upon the bar.
> If the depth to be maintained is twenty-seven feet at low water or twenty-eight feet at high water, it will be found by a similar process that the annual advance will not be less than one thousand two hundred feet.

We have thus the opinion of General Humphreys and the opinion of the whole Corps of Engineers except General Barnard that this system is impracticable, General Humphreys saying that they must be extended at the rate of twelve hundred feet per year.

Before my time expires there is one other point to which I desire to call attention. The proposition now before Congress is presented in a most inviting form. It is said that unless Captain Eads succeeds he receives no pay. I have no doubt from all the attention I have given to the subject he may succeed for three, four, five, or perhaps six or seven years. But I think I can demonstrate why he cannot succeed ultimately. We have in consequence of the bar only from fourteen to sixteen feet of water. By constructing his jetties far enough he may drive the bar into deeper water. But when the time comes which must necessarily be in a few years, when the bar again comes near the surface, from that time forward it would be necessary again to extend the jetties in order to drive the bar seaward. General Humphreys demonstrates this. Captain Eads, therefore, may get perhaps four or six million dollars and may succeed for four, five, six, or seven years, but when failure comes it is complete; and then the jetties will have to be extended annually, as is shown by General Humphreys. This seems to me certain.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 273) to reduce the area of the military reservation of Fort Sanders, and providing for the survey of said reservation as reduced;

An act (H. R. No. 955) for the relief of J. L. Tedrow, of Clarke County, Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 1297) for the relief of Thomas T. Crittenden, of Missouri; and

An act (H. R. No. 1936) for the relief of Dewight Desilva, of Deposit, New York.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

[Mr. LEWIS addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. SHELDON. I am greatly surprised when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LEWIS] denounced the Army engineers he should quote General Barnard, the oldest and in consequence of his age the feeblest in the service and who is therefore assigned to no active duty. I agree with the gentleman in the importance of an open mouth, but he utterly fails to show how that can be secured. If I can get the ear of the gentleman I think I will be able to convince him his idea is entirely utopian.

Mr. DAWES. Before the gentleman proceeds further I would like to call his attention to a remark he has just made in reference to General Barnard, who he says is the oldest and therefore the feeblest of these engineers.

Mr. SHELDON. I said in consequence of his age.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman said he was the oldest and therefore the feeblest, so feeble that he is relieved from all duty.

Mr. SHELDON. I said active duty; and that is the fact.

Mr. DAWES. General Barnard has the misfortune to have a defect in his hearing. I do not conceive that that would disable him from the discharge of any duty of this kind. I wish to do justice to General Barnard, for he is a constituent of mine, and a native of my own county. He stands among the very first——

Mr. SHELDON. I do not consent that this shall come out of my time, which is limited. I do not intend to do General Barnard any injustice.

Mr. DAWES. I would leave it exactly in that way. It does not do to whistle a man down the wind and allow nothing to be said in his behalf.

Mr. SHELDON. What I said was simply because of his age.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose he is about the age of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SHELDON] himself. He is probably between the age of that gentleman and my own. I remember him when he was a boy.

Mr. SHELDON. I was saying, and if I can get the hearing of the gentleman from Tennessee I think I shall be able to convince him that his idea of an open mouth is utterly utopian. The very question at issue is, can there be such a thing as an open mouth? It involves most important engineering principles. I solicit the attention of the gentleman to what I am about to say, and I ask if he can dispute it?

Mr. Speaker, the subject under consideration is not an ordinary one. The beneficial effect of so improving the outlet to the sea by the way of the Mississippi River as to adequately supply the demands of commerce will be so great and wide-spread that the project must be regarded as more completely national in its character than any similar one ever before Congress. It should command a thorough study from every gentleman on this floor, not merely because it is important, but it involves principles of engineering concerning which we cannot afford to be mistaken. Members of Congress are not usually engineers, and in order to act intelligently upon this question considerable investigation is required, or they must act upon the views of those belonging to that profession as a matter of faith. The great interest of my constituents in this improvement has compelled me to give study to the subject, and because I have done so, though not an engineer, I shall risk the appearance of impudence by asking the House to listen to and weigh the argument I propose to make. And let me assure gentlemen that, although I come to the investigation of this subject with the strongest desire to see this improvement made, yet I have been and am without the slightest proclivity as to the mode of its accomplishment, provided the work shall be ample and permanent.

The first question which arises is, shall we undertake this improvement? Are the interests to be promoted of sufficient magnitude to justify the necessary expenditure? If upon this point the decision is in the negative the discussion of methods is unnecessary. It would seem that the country had been educated enough through the agencies of chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and commercial conventions, to leave no doubt as to the propriety and necessity of this improvement, but in these times of exacerbated economy everything relating to the expenditure of money is uncertain even for the most meritorious measure, and I am induced to present the reasons why this work should be undertaken, because its transcendent importance, when considered, must overcome the indisposition to expend the public funds.

It has been often said that transportation is the most important question of the day. The whole people are considering the subject with an intense feeling. Every man is affected by the cost of carrying, whether he be producer or consumer. The people on the Atlantic coast are fed and supplied with raw materials to a considerable extent from the Mississippi valley, and in turn commodities manufactured in the East or imported from foreign countries are conveyed to the interior for consumption. The North and the South mutually supply one to the other many articles of necessity or luxury. Domestic commerce in its extent and ramifications should be the subject for a book rather than of a speech. But general facts may be stated to show the outlines of this trade.

The Mississippi River and tributaries contain sixteen thousand miles of navigable water, entering into eighteen States and several Territories, and drain a domain of nearly a million square miles. The population inhabiting this region approximates twenty millions, nearly one-half the numerical strength of the nation. It is probable that at this time the production of wheat, corn, rye, oats, buckwheat, barley, and potatoes equals fifteen hundred million bushels, two-thirds of which is sufficient to supply consumption in this section. The markets of the country are supplied from the Mississippi Valley with fully one and one-half million cattle, two million sheep, and five million hogs. The surplus of food products alone cannot be less than $1,000,000,000 in value, which must find eastern and foreign markets or be wasted at home. More than one-half the cotton is produced here, and for want of local manufactures must be transported to the East or to Europe, to be wrought into fabrics and in part retransported for consumption. Population and production are more rapidly on the increase in the Mississippi Valley than elsewhere, and the more trade develops the more grievous will become the charges for transportation.

It is no wonder that the present and prospective burdens imposed for carrying products to market have caused the formation of a party powerful in numbers and earnest in purpose, who make relief from them the cardinal principle of their platform. The greatest strength of this party is in the Mississippi Valley, because there the burden is most felt. Agriculturists more sensibly feel this grievance from the bulky nature of their productions and the small profits of their business. Besides, the capital invested in railroads is largely owned in the East, and the profits in the main inure to the people of that section. As railroads furnish the chief means for commercial intercourse, it is quite natural that attention should first be turned to them, and that the plan of reducing freight charges by legal means should be resorted to as an initial and practical measure.

In obedience to a resistless popular sentiment, this branch of Congress consumed many days in the discussion of a bill to regulate railroad transportation. Although it passed this body, it cannot be denied that in the opinion of many men grave constitutional questions were involved, and still more serious doubts as to the practical benefit which would result from it or any similar measure. Under the Constitution it is clear that navigable waters within the limits of the United States are under the control of Congress, while it is not controverted that each of the thirty-seven States in their own way and manner may charter and control railroads within their respective limits and so far as relates to the inhabitants of such State. If Congress can exercise any control it must be limited and inadequate.

Competition is the best regulator of prices. Experience has shown that as a rule competition among railroad companies ends in combination. The track and rolling-stock are private property; none but the owner can use or control them. Nobody will assert that the Government of the nation or of the State, or both together, can deprive the owner of the occupation of his property and throw it open to the public use. The subject of cheapening transportation by railway through the power of legislation is surrounded with legal and practical difficulties. If the charges of carrying upon a public highway are unacceptable, the dissatisfied may put on his own team and lessen the cost by his own competition. The rivers and the lakes are the common roadways of the people, open to receive the vehicle of any one. Then competition may be effectual. Upon them there can be no monopoly, no exclusive right. Moreover, the river and lake are given to the people free of the cost of construction, and almost expenseless in repair and maintenance, while the building and preservation of railroads cost large sums of money, and they must be managed to pay expenses and a reasonable profit upon the capital invested. Enough has been said to make it apparent that the true method of cheapening the cost of transportation is to improve water lines wherever practicable and throw them into competition with land lines. Public attention is already turned to this subject, and thoughtful men believe that the adoption of this policy cannot be long postponed.

The physical characteristics of the country invite the adoption of this policy. Nature seems to have been mindful of the wants of the interior. Little of this great section lies remote from some navigable water-channel, or one which can be made navigable at a small expense as compared with the benefits which will result. The channels through which the water of the interior finds its way to the sea indicate the routes of transportation. The extreme northern portion of the Mississippi Valley has its chain of lakes, and a little canalization will enable ships to reach the Atlantic coast without change of cargo. The Canadian government have utilized these advantages more than we have, and there is great danger that by the execution of further designs the commerce of much of the Northwest will pass through foreign waters and pay tribute to foreign people. It will cost little time and money to connect the lakes with the Hudson River, which would give us all the profits of this trade, and it can be conducted more cheaply and expeditiously than through the waters of the British dominion.

The James and the Kanawha Rivers are separated by but a narrow space, and the same is true of the Tennessee and the rivers of Georgia. A little artificial aid will create water-channels in these directions, and their utilization must soon become necessary to accommodate increasing population and production in their vicinity.

While all these lines are of great value to large and productive sections, there is another channel whose improvement to the extent of supplying every demand of commerce will cause the expenditure of less time and money than any other, and will benefit the whole population from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic Sea. It is never closed by ice, and when the mouth of the Mississippi River is made navigable for the largest ships, the Mississippi Valley will be accessible to all nations and all ports of our own, and the trade of our interior cities may be direct with all the world.

The cereal producers of the West are most vitally interested in this improvement, because it opens a direct route to the peoples who do not produce breadstuffs, and who ought to and soon must obtain their supplies in this country. We must rely upon Mexico, the West India Islands, and the northern states of South America to consume our surplus. This cannot become the channel of exportation for the West without acquiring the control of larger importations to supply the people of the eighteen States into which its navigable waters extend. This route will furnish competition to the railway lines the whole of the year from Cairo southward, and for eight or nine months even as far up as Cincinnati on the Ohio, and Keokuk on the Mississippi, while the lake channel is closed by ice for five out of the twelve months.

It is important to inquire whether transportation by this line is or will be cheaper than by railways, and will it pay the expense of opening and keeping open. No plan of improvement contemplates the expenditure of more than $10,000,000 to complete, and the one which I favor will cost much less to maintain, as I shall hereafter show, than to continue the ineffectual process of dredging now practiced.

It is estimated that the Atlantic States buy of the West thirty million bushels of wheat and eighty million bushels corn annually for consumption, and our export of breadstuffs averages about $75,000,000 per annum, the bulk of this being raised in the West. It is safe to say that there is transported from the Mississippi Valley to the East for exportation or domestic consumption not less than one hundred and fifty million bushels of food products each year. From five leading points in the West to New York the cost of transporting a bushel of corn, wheat, or oats by rail is forty cents, more than twice the average cost of production. At the present time, with all the delays and perplexities caused by the obstruction at the mouth of the Mississippi River, the cost of carrying from the same points to New York is twenty-four cents, or a difference of sixteen cents. On one hundred million bushels of grain sent by rail to the sea-board the saving annually would be $6,000,000, more than the expense of the improvement contemplated. The present depth of water on the bar will not pass a ship carrying more than forty thousand bushels, while with a depth of twenty-three feet there may be carried from seventy-five to ninety thousand bushels, and this increase of load will justify the belief that the price of freight could be reduced. The facts stated will enable us to make some estimate of the whole saving which would result from this improvement. And the saving will inure to the benefit of consumer and producer, and will be enhanced in the same ratio that population and production increase.

It has been a question of some doubt whether wheat and corn can be carried by the way of the river and Gulf in warm weather to foreign countries without damage. Without the presence of dampness, heat of atmosphere does not damage these grains. If damp and confined, injury will result in any climate and at any season. The experience of the farmer shows that his corn keeps as well in summer as in winter with the same care. But the solution of this question is not left to argument. That it can be carried with safety has been demonstrated by thorough and continued experience. It is shown that corn shipped from New Orleans to any foreign port reaches the point of destination in just as good condition as from any port in the United States. Grain is shipped from Europe to Brazil and other warm countries at all seasons, traversing the torrid zone, and no complaint of damage is made caused by warm weather. The grain merchants of Saint Louis are particularly satisfied upon this point, as is shown by their efforts to establish steamship lines to the countries south of us.

The people of this country begin to feel some solicitude on the subject of adverse balances of trade to be paid in coin. It is seen that the desire to resume specie payment cannot be gratified unless some steps are taken to retain the coin productions in the country until the quantity will enable us to resume naturally and easily. Hence there is a growing disposition to do something to increase exportation. We export all the cotton and petroleum we can spare. It at once occurs to a thoughtful man that our facilities for producing breadstuffs should cause us to endeavor to increase their exportation. This we cannot successfully do unless the cost of transportation to the sea-board is cheapened. The development of water lines is the only means by which it can be accomplished; and the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River will put us in the most direct communication with the people who will be most likely to demand our surplus.

Since 1824 the Government has expended more than $40,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and three-fourths of it east of the Apalachian Mountains. Considerable liberality has been displayed toward the northern lakes. I do not find fault with this, for these expenditures were useful, and it is proper that attention should be given first to the localities settled and developed earliest. The people of the South and West do not wish other sections neglected, but they do think when they present the greatest and least expensive work, as regards the interests involved, ever placed before the American Congress, it should not be postponed for others, but should be preferred rather, inasmuch as other sections have had their full share, and at a time when it would most encourage development. We want this now. We most need it now. For the money expended in this enterprise we will return a hundred fold to the Treasury; we will return to the people of the East more than they lose by taxation in the reduced price at which we will sell them our products. My constituents are vitally interested; but I do not ask this work for them, not alone for the great Northwest, but for the entire nation; for every man, woman, and child will be benefited.

The importance of this subject must be too well understood and appreciated to need extended argument or presentation of facts. Hoping and believing that it is the purpose of Congress to do this work in some way, I shall address myself to the plans suggested.

It need not be said that the generation which preceded us saw this subject looming up in all its present prominence, and took steps to understand the laws which govern bar formations and the means to obviate them. The practical result thus far has been to apply dredging mainly because of its inexpensive character, and as an experiment until some other plan could be devised. It is now conceded that dredging can never procure more than eighteen to twenty feet of water, and that not continuously, when commerce demands twenty-seven feet permanently. So that we are now driven to content ourselves with an inadequate and uncertain channel, at a considerable annual expense, or adopt some other plan which will give an ample and certain channel, even though abstractly the cost may seem something of a burden. Two plans have been presented to Congress—one by means of jetties to remove, the other by means of a canal to flank, the bar.

Before entering directly upon a discussion of the merits of the two plans it is well to describe the character of the obstruction to be removed or flanked. It is believed by some that the mouth of the Mississippi River was at one time as high up as the point of confluence with the Ohio, and that it has pushed the bar to the present location, filling up the vast alluvial regions bordering on either side. However this may be, careful measurement extending through a series of years demonstrates that the bar advances into the Gulf about one mile in fifteen years. The volume of the Mississippi is not excelled by that of any other river in the world, and the quantity of sediment carried along by its current exceeds in proportion to quantity of water that of any other river of magnitude. This sediment is composed of sand, mud, vegetable matter, and minerals in particles and in solution. So soon as the river water comes in contact with the still and heavier water of the Gulf the current is retarded and the sedimentary substances begin to fall to the bottom. By chemical action the saline element of the Gulf water combines with some of these substances, and the result is a tough, adhesive material or earth, difficult to disunite or cut away. Large masses form and constitute "mud lumps," which through the power of gas or some other cause rise to and above the surface and obstruct the channel, and thus far have proved destructive to any work of man. An obstruction composed of such material is ever forming, always advancing, and will continue to form and advance so long as this mighty river and tributaries continue the process of leveling down the continent; and this bar which exists at every mouth furnishes a depth of about fifteen feet of water on an average and at the most favorable pass. At the Southwest Pass, which is the largest and deepest, for one and one-half miles the water is generally no more than fifteen feet deep. The bottom is uneven, unstable, and changeable like all newly formed earth subject to the influence of currents and storms.

Thus far in the discussion the advocates of jetties and the friends of the canal substantially agree. It is now that the divergence commences—a divergence in philosophy, in professional opinion, and in precedent. There may be some disagreement as to the manner in which the sediment reaches the Gulf, but this is immaterial as it finds its way there by means of some force or other, and forms the obstruction I have described.

The philosophy of jetties is that by narrowing the channel or confining the current a greater velocity will be secured, which will accomplish the removal which before there has been a failure to do, because the obstruction will be moved against by a greater perpendicular force. There is some force in the theory as an abstraction. That the bar is gradually pushed out further into the Gulf by the current of the river is undoubtedly true, and that the river provides its own walls or jetties so fast as the earth acquires foundation and solidity is a fact demonstrated to common observation. Nature takes its own time and does its work very slowly and as well as possible under the circumstances and with the material at hand. But this process does no good in accomplishing what commerce demands. As nature's jetties advance the bar advances, ever rearing its obstruction across the pathway of ships. Like the ghost of Banquo it will not down.

Artificial jetties are designed to assist nature to build where nature has made no attempt. They must be structures of considerable weight in order to have sufficient strength to withstand the pressure of the volume of water within and the force of waves and storms without. Nature's jetties do not extend beyond the bar; on the contrary, the bar constantly maintains an advanced position. Hence to remove the obstruction temporarily artificial structures must be built beyond the crest, for so soon as the current passes beyond the point of confinement it loses velocity, and consequently its eroding power. To build them on this soft and treacherous foundation is to hazard their sinking, or their overthrow by storms or "mud lumps." They will not be a house founded on a rock by any means. Jetties were once attempted here; and while I consider this experiment no test as to their general efficiency, yet the fact that structures of a light character cannot be maintained was illustrated by their early demolition. The Spanish once built a fort near the mouth, but it sunk out of sight so long ago that the oldest inhabitant is unable to point out the spot where it stood; and it was built not upon earth so newly formed as the bar, nor where storms and waves could disturb. If jetties were constructed with such deep foundations as to resist all disturbing forces they might stand for a time at least. It seems preposterous to me to attempt to acquire a depth of twenty-seven feet by building jetties on the bar where the water is but fifteen feet deep; for if erosion takes place to the extent desired there would be great danger that they would slide into the center and form a more difficult obstruction to remove than the bar itself.

The bar is composed of such material in part at least as to require a decided increase of velocity to remove it within a reasonable time. Whether such increased force can be obtained to cut away to a depth of twenty-seven feet is not entirely free from doubt. It is a well-known law that the narrowing of a channel obstructed at its mouth will cause the water to set back and seek escape where there is less resistance. The Mississippi River has seventeen mouths, of all sizes, through which the water would pass, and for many miles above the banks are low and narrow, and no great elevation would be required before the water would pass out over the banks, cutting away new avenues of escape. The recent overflow causes apprehensions of danger arising from further obstructing any one of the many mouths now existing.

Whether jetties can be made to stand or not, or whether the velocity of the current will speedily or leisurely erode a channel through the bar, is not the great question upon which the case is to be decided. The bar does extend constantly, and jetties to be permanently effectual must keep pace with it. The bar extends now three hundred and thirty-eight feet annually, and if the channel is narrowed and the same quantity of water continues to debouch into the sea, a fact not denied, the same amount of sediment must be precipitated to the bottom as before, and so soon as the same cause is applied. To narrow the channel will reduce the width of surface over which the water will spread, and the bar must advance more rapidly than at present. An enhanced velocity may prolong at first the distance over which the deposit may take place, but in brief time the advance of the bar will assume its logical and natural extension. General Humphreys estimates the annual advance under the jetty plan proposed to be a thousand to twelve hundred feet per annum. This will compel an extension of jetties at the same rate and at a cost which the Government has no right to endure, if a better and cheaper plan can be devised. Jetties cannot be extended indefinitely. In time they must be abandoned after having incurred vast expense, and the obstruction will rear its head again, and become at once as hideous as we now see it. It was a wise thought in Captain Eads to limit his responsibility to ten years.

It has been said that the extension of the bar will not take place at all, or but slightly at the worst, for the reason that there are currents which will bear the sediment away to some remote place. It would not be good logic to say that the Gulf currents would do for artificial jetties what has never been done for those formed by nature. The mouths of the river have advanced into the Gulf far beyond all the surrounding land. For fifty miles beyond everything else have they gone sea-ward, the bar holding the same relative position at every step in advance. This is unanswerable proof that there is no littoral current there, or if existing at all, it is so slight as not to produce any appreciable effect. But beyond this the study of this subject by engineers and scientists has continued for more than forty years, and repeated examinations have been made and tests applied, and no evidence of a littoral current has been discovered, nor has its existence ever been claimed until the jetty project was invented.

The fact that a bar does not form in front of the jetties at the Soolina mouth of the Danube is made the basis of the theory that it will not form at the mouth of the Mississippi River. When conditions are identical, the application of a principle will be followed by the same results. Sir Charles Hartley was careful to find out the existence of a littoral current before he attempted the construction of jetties at the Soolina. Its existence was apparent, because the banks were already eroded and the shore at the point in its general outline was concave. At the mouth of the Mississippi there is no evidence of erosion; on the contrary, the shore or bank is sharply convex. The bar has not formed at the mouth of the Soolina after a test of two years or thereabouts, and whether ultimately it will is not entirely certain; but as a different condition exists at the mouth of the Mississippi, it is as certain that the bar will extend there as it is certain that the bar has not formed at the mouth of the Soolina. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Chief of Engineers addressed to me on this subject, which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1874.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 10th instant, asking for my reasons in full for considering the plan of obtaining a deep channel between the Mississippi River and the sea by canal, preferable to the plan of obtaining that deep channel by constructing jetties at the mouth of the river.

A discussion of the engineering questions involved in the use of jetties to deepen the mouth, would be out of place in this letter, and is rendered unnecessary by my having this day submitted a report upon the subject to the Secretary of War, which will, I presume, be transmitted to Congress as forming a sequence to the report of the board of engineers upon deepening the entrance to the Mississippi River by a canal and by jetties.

There is no question as to the practicability of constructing the canal; and when constructed its maintenance will cost a comparatively small sum, probably not exceeding 1 per cent. of the first cost. That first cost, along the route surveyed, is estimated by the majority of the board of engineers to be $10,273,000, an estimate which is entitled to confidence, the officers composing that majority being among the ablest and most experienced in the Corps of Engineers.

The canal as proposed to be constructed will afford ample facilities for all the commerce of New Orleans for many years.

In my report to the Secretary of War of to-day's date, I have submitted an estimate of the cost of constructing jetties at the mouth of the Southwest Pass to deepen the channel to twenty-seven feet at low water, the structures to be carried down to the full depth of the channel throughout their length; the whole to be of a permanent character. This estimate amounts to $7,000,000. If the jetties were simply built upon the surface of the bar and not extended downward, their cost would be about one-half that sum. This mode of construction has been suggested by some engineers, and would be suitable if a long time were allowed for the erosion of the channel way to the required depth. But this erosion must take place in a short time and must be controlled by the jetty structures. Hence the necessity of their being carried down to the depth of the intended channel.

The bar of the Southwest Pass in its natural state extends annually into the Gulf an average distance of three hundred and thirty-eight feet. This annual extension takes place at high water, when the sediment is swept by the current along the bottom of the river and over the surface of the bar into the still salt water of the Gulf. The width of the bar where this annual growth takes place is about twelve thousand feet. The jetties will reduce this width to three or four thousand feet, and as the quantity of earthy matter annually swept to the Gulf in the manner stated will be on the average the same, and as the jetties will force it to form on a width one-third or one-fourth of the width it formed on in the natural state of the bar, its length must, of course, be three or four times greater than in the natural state of the bar; and we shall thus have the annual growth of the bar from one thousand to twelve hundred feet.

Now the depth of water on this annual addition to the bar would not be the same as that between the jetties, but less, because the annual addition will lie along the upward slope upon which the fresh water rises on the salt water. Hence the necessity of extending the jetties as fast as the bar is extended, if we wish to maintain a uniform depth of water at the entrance.

This extension of the jetties must be made in from thirty to forty feet water, and will cost in the case of the Southwest Pass about $1,000,000 annually.

We have, then, for deepening to and maintaining the depth of twenty-seven feet at low water a capital of $23,000,000.

Applying the jetty system to the South Pass for the same depth, the estimate will amount to—

First cost of jetties	$4,150,000
Annual cost of maintenance, including dredging through shoals in the pass	780,000
Which together represent a capital of about	17,000,000

I am aware that Mr. Eads states that it will not be necessary to extend the jetties after they have once deepened the bar to the desired depth, and presents the grounds of his conclusion substantially as follows:

The Mississippi River, he says, carries in suspension a certain amount of earthy matter, which is fixed and unvaried for each velocity of current; when the velocity is decreased the sediment is at once reduced in quantity, some of it being dropped to the bottom; when the velocity is increased the quantity of suspended sediment is at once increased by the current picking up earthy matter.

He next states that the current of the river being suddenly and largely checked where it meets the Gulf at the outer edge of the bar, its suspended matter is dropped there in large quantities and forms the annual addition to the bar.

His first proposition is directly contradicted by the observed conditions existing on the Mississippi River, and indeed everywhere else. It was found by a long series of carefully conducted measurements on the river near New Orleans and at Columbus, twenty miles below the mouth of the Ohio, that when the velocity of the current was greatest the quantity of earthy matter was about the same as when the velocity was least; and that the greatest quantity of suspended earthy matter found near New Orleans was at a time when the velocity of the current was two feet per second less than the greatest velocity.

Similar results were found at Columbus, one of them being that when the velocity of the current was only two and a half feet per second the quantity of earthy matter in suspension was about equal to the maximum quantity. In short, there was no direct relation between the velocity of current and the quantity of earthy matter suspended; the latter depending upon the tributary river which at the time furnished the chief volume of the Mississippi, and being kept in suspension by the stirring-up process, caused by the great irregularities in the bed of the Mississippi. Mr. Eads refers to the Bonnet Carré crevasse as furnishing an instance in point of the deposit of earthy matter when the current decreased in velocity, but the bottom of the river where it was said this deposit had occurred was found by the Mississippi Delta investigation to be hard blue clay, which had been there for centuries. In fine the facts developed by the investigations of the Mississippi Delta survey prove this proposition of Mr. Eads to be utterly unfounded.

His second proposition, that the current of the Mississippi River receives a sudden check upon meeting the salt water of the Gulf, is as unfounded as his first. Personal observation alone, without the use of instruments, would make this plain to one accustomed to the observation of currents; but these currents have been measured, and it is found that there is no sudden check to the current of the river where it enters the Gulf; on the contrary, it decreases so slowly that repeated nice measurements over long distances are required to detect any decrease in the velocity of the current; and in fact it decreases very slowly from the point where the pass begins to widen until it finally ceases in the case of the Southwest Pass at the end of twenty or thirty miles.

The bills I have seen proposing to contract with Mr. Eads to deepen the entrance to the Mississippi River to twenty-eight feet at high water are based, I understand, upon the adoption of his view that there will be no necessity for extending the jetties after they have once deepened the entrance to the required depth, although it is explicitly stated in these bills that $5,000,000 are to be paid Mr. Eads for deepening the entrance to the required depth, and another five millions subsequently for deepening and maintaining the depth a certain time. After the last annual payment to him of $1,000,000 under the second clause, what security is there that he will continue to maintain the depth if he should find that he was mistaken in his views, and that it will cost him a million annually to maintain the depth? None is proposed in the bills I have seen, and it is manifest that, in reality, the United States takes all the risk of his views and project; and if he should be found to be mistaken, the United States will be in the condition of having expended five millions for jetties and three millions for their maintenance, and then be obliged either to abandon the work or go on with a perpetual annual expenditure of about a million. Now the canal once built is permanently useful at a small annual expenditure, and the sums involved by the differences of opinion respecting its cost are small compared to the magnitude of those resulting from the differences of conclusion respecting the permanent effects of the jetty system; the adverse conclusion respecting the use of jetties being based upon carefully observed facts and investigations, and the other upon suppositions in direct conflict with the conditions known from investigation to exist.

There is one feature in these bills which if it could be introduced in the appropriations for river and harbor improvements would conduce to great economy. I refer to the provision that is made for a permanent fund for construction of the work. Such a provision would save the cost of outfit from each annual appropriation for a work, since under existing laws every improvement must be carried on by contract with the lowest responsible bidder as each annual appropriation is made

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. L. A. SHELDON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SHELDON. Jetties as a plan for deepening rivers have no history. In few cases only have they been tried. No river of magnitude has ever been jettied. They have never been attempted except in rivers comparatively small. And so unsuccessful have been the experiments, that engineers of ability and reputation have never resorted to them except under the most favorable circumstances; and so signal have been the failures, that a single precedent is cited to sustain the theory of their application to the mouth of the Mississippi River. To say that because jetties have proved efficacious at the mouth of the Soolina, therefore they will be successful at the mouth of the Mississippi, would be like saying that because a suit of clothes will fit a mere child, therefore it can be put on a full-grown man. The conditions are all unlike, in magnitude of river, in volume of water, in character and quantity of sediment, in the matter of a littoral current, in exposure to storms, and in the character of earth upon which the structure is to be founded.

It will serve to enlighten us if we examine the opinions of the engineering profession upon this subject. And it is not a new question. For forty years it has been under investigation. The Government has expended considerable sums of money for the purpose of having the subject of improving the mouth of the Mississippi River understood. The ablest of our official engineers have been assigned to the work, and I think I am safe in saying that not one of those who have a personal knowledge of the phenomena of the bar and the surrounding country favor jetties. The board lately assigned to the duty of considering the report of Captain Howell on the feasibility and project of a canal ably and fully considered every plan yet suggested, and reported unfavorably on the jetty plan. This board was composed of seven officers, and was probably the ablest of the kind ever assembled on the continent—one only dissenting. The Chief of Engineers, who has given more personal observation and study to the subject than any other man, concurs emphatically with the majority; and no man on this continent stands higher in the profession. The dissentient has no acquaintance with the mouth of the river as a subject of special study. Governor Hebert and Professor Forshey, able and experienced engineers, and who have spent their whole lives in dealing with this great river and in studying its laws and forces, unite in the opinion that the jetty plan is an empiricism. These gentlemen are familiar with every experiment ever made, and have a practical knowledge better than all theories. General Humphreys was a witness in an official capacity to the experiment and failure of Craig and Righter, who attempted to jetty Pass a Loutre under a contract with the Government, and manifested a leniency toward the contractors which evinced a desire to see the experiment thoroughly made. The prostration of their structures from time to time by the forces which I have attempted to describe probably did much to produce the opinion that if jetties can be made to stand at all they must be deeply founded and strongly built, and that their extension must be continual and at an expense that the Government cannot afford.

It is claimed that there is engineering opinion on the other side. General Barnard believes in jetties, but has no special knowledge of the Mississippi River. Captain Eads argues for jetties, and bases his opinion upon general laws and makes facts for their application which do not exist. He has never acquainted himself with the character and conditions of the river he proposes to improve. He is more acquainted with Sir Charles Hartley's description of his work at the Soolina mouth of the Danube than he is with the forces and phenomena of the Mississippi mouths. He does not and cannot deny the necessity of perpetual extension of jetties, and that they must at some time be abandoned. To do so would be to deny the plainest principles of philosophy and facts as palpable as that there is a bar that seriously embarrasses the commerce of the whole Mississippi Valley. I would much rather risk his judgment as a gun-boat builder or bridge constructor than on the subject of removing the bar at the Southwest Pass by means of jetties. The Rev. Mr. Fontaine, I believe, has re-enforced Mr. Eads. The argument of this new luminary in the engineering profession is a rehash of what Eads has been trying to say, and is novel only in the fact that he has discovered a littoral current. This discovery is simultaneous with the advent of this reverend gentleman into the engineering world. Not one other engineer has attempted to make an argument on the jetty side. A few gentlemen have expressed an approval of Eads's theory, but their letters remind me of a practice among politicians who recommend applications for office by subscribing to the words "I concur," and none of them are familiar with the subject from observation and study. Lawyers soon learn that a legal opinion is only valuable after it has been well considered. It is a good principle to apply everywhere. Under Government direction we have obtained an official opinion on which the utmost reliance should be placed, because the subject has been thoroughly examined by experienced and able men in the profession. The board of engineers, in their report, make use of the following language:

> This yearly progress of the bar demands corresponding extension of the jetties into the deep water exposed to the severe storms of the Gulf, and consequently of great cost. The difficulties at the mouth of the Mississippi, so far as concerns the improvement by jetties, resolve themselves into three sources: first, the absence of a littoral current; second, the yielding nature of the banks and shoals; third, the abundance of the deposits. The first and third combine in the yearly and rapid extension of the bar, and compel the works of improvement to continue at a heavy annual cost until their entire abandonment. The second makes their construction difficult and their maintenance improbable unless deeply founded at a very heavy expense.

The canal plan will flank the bar. None question its feasibility; hence it is unnecessary to make an argument upon it. About forty miles from the mouth, on the left bank, by cutting a channel about seven miles long, the deep water of the Gulf can be reached. By the construction of a lock at the river entrance water will be excluded except when ships are passed through. This will be so trifling that a very small quantity of sediment will be deposited in the canal, and which can be thrown out with little labor and small expense. Captain Howell says it can be done in a few days in each year. The Gulf terminus will be in a land-locked harbor, where ships may find shelter from the severest storms. It will not cost more than $10,000,000 to make it a complete and ample channel for the largest ships, and fifty or a hundred thousand dollars annually will take care of it and keep it in repair. Thorough investigations show that the earth is solid enough to sustain the locks and to preserve the sides of the canal with slight revetments, and perhaps with none at all. If the bar has advanced at the rate of a mile in fifteen years, which has been demonstrated by actual measurement, the earth at this point is six hundred years old. If the newly formed earth at the bar has strength and solidity enough to maintain jetties, which must be of great weight to be permanent, surely a canal with a lock can be maintained where the earth is of such old formation. The engineers have settled this question beyond controversy. With such provisions for making payments that the work can be continuously carried on, the canal and all its appurtenances can be completed in three years. When finished commerce will be amply provided for, and the distance for all ships coming from or destined to ports east of the mouth will be shortened sixty miles. The light-draught ships can pass through the natural channels as they now do, and the heavy ones through the canal. The expense of lightering, towing, and piloting will be greatly reduced, and commerce will be freer and cheaper.

It is a patent fact that while no engineer, not even Eads himself, questions the practicability or utility of a canal, no one who has thus far participated in this debate has assailed the plan of a canal as an engineering question or as a useful and certain mode of getting out to sea. It is also to be observed that no one, whether he be engineer or an Eads advocate, on this floor or elsewhere speaks of the jetty plan as other than an experiment, and the whole argument shows that the construction of a canal is contemplated if jetties should prove a failure. The point that a sufficient survey has not been made to locate a canal is a mere technicality. Its feasibility has been determined, but the precise point of location has not. The canal bill provides for that location and for all surveys that are necessary. And this is enough, as the main facts are determined. The advocates of the canal are opposed to delay; and the reason assigned by the jetty advocates for postponing the canal is as flimsy as is the philosophy by which the jetty theory is sustained.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] is afraid of the terrible cyclones in their effect upon the canal. Severe storms do happen once in a great while. But I am not aware that they have a particular appetite for canals. Breton Harbor, the Gulf terminus of the proposed canal, has never been disturbed or filled up. The increased height of the banks by the excavated earth will secure the canal against all the imaginary danger suggested. But no such danger exists. However, if the canal will be liable to dangers of the character depicted, how will it be with jetties? Will they not fill up, and will not Captain Eads be compelled to bring up his currents and probably dredge-boats to remove the obstructions thrown into the channel by the cyclones? They, I believe, visit the mouths of rivers quite as often as the mouths of canals. And at the mouths of rivers the loose earth is much more abundant than elsewhere. The whole thing about cyclones of the character described is a chimera, a scarecrow worthy only of a cause that has no philosophy to rest upon.

The plan of a canal it is said will absolutely require an expenditure of the public money. Undoubtedly; but the result is beyond a peradventure. Captain Eads proposes to risk his money and that of his friends upon an experiment. I admit the proposition is somewhat seductive. If his experiment succeeds you give him $10,000,000 for ten years, and then the Government is saddled with the expense of extension, which General Humphrey thinks will not be less than $1,000,000 a year, and at some day not very remote the work must be abandoned. There is no security that Eads will undertake the execution of his plan or that he will prosecute it any further than to reimburse himself for his expenditures. For he is entitled to part pay before he accomplishes very much to the advantage of commerce, and before it can possibly be determined whether his experiment will prove a permanent success. It is by no means certain that in case of failure the Government will pay nothing. It is not infrequently the case that claims arising under similar contracts are passed through Congress. If after a considerable sum of money has been expended and lost Eads and his associates come here clad in garments which excite pity, slightly adorned with pretensions of having done some good, a generous and sympathetic Congress may make up their losses.

But, sir, is it wise in the presence of the immense interests involved for the American Congress to adopt an experiment, when the official engineers are so pronounced against it, when abandonment must take place sooner or later? Shall we agree to expend $10,000,000 to improve navigation for ten years, when for the same sum it may be improved forever? Canals have ever been useful, and they have been tried as long as civilization has existed, and in every country inhabited by civilized man.

My objections are that jetties may obstruct nature's channels and make them less navigable than now, and add to the dangers of overflow, the distressing effects of which are now so visible and overwhelming, and that the experiment will postpone indefinitely a plan that is a certainty. The railroad companies engaged in transporting from the interior to the sea-coast can afford to sink $10,000,000 in an experiment which will continue to them the monopoly of transportation for a period of five years. It is a suggestive fact that many of the engineers who indorse Eads, without argument but by expressing concurrence, are in some manner connected with these railroad lines.

We have experimented too long already. It is time to cease. The country will not and ought not to endure it longer. General Warren has the proper conception of this subject. He says:

> My mind, however, is fixed upon the idea that the canal is the only project that will meet the commercial, naval, and military demands of the United States. Its feasibility has never been doubted by any one, and only on account of its cost have other methods been heretofore recommended. These other methods have always been regarded as experiments, and the reliance has been that if they failed the canal as a final resort was certain. I believe the time has come when that which appears certain should be tried first. The cost of the canal will not be great compared with the end to be gained; and there is no certainty that we will not have to come to it after great delay and expenditure upon other methods, none of which when abandoned will have aided in the least toward constructing the canal.

Sir, when completed, we shall have expended $3,000,000 for a canal around the Des Moines Rapids, and nearly as much for one around the Falls of the Ohio, and are annually making appropriations to improve all the navigable tributaries of the Mississippi that commerce may be unembarrassed and facilitated, and how imperfect will be the work unless the outlet to the sea is made ample and permanent! Without it all the other improvements and expenditures will fail to produce their full benefit, will chiefly relate to internal, when their full utilization can only be experienced by giving a free and reliable access to external commerce.

If Congress shall undertake this improvement it must be no piecemeal affair. Those who have familiarized themselves with the subject know that partial appropriations, or appropriations from year to year, impose upon the Government an increased cost, and in many instances to the extent of 40 per cent. The construction of a canal requires the procurement of expensive machinery, which ought not to remain idle. There are many causes of enhanced expenditures when delay is necessary for want of means. Besides, trade suffers and burdens are endured by the whole people by postponing the completion of this work.

Mr. STANARD. I feel a deep interest in the subject which is under consideration to-day, perhaps more so because of the fact that during all of my business life I have been engaged to a greater or less extent in the commerce of the Mississippi River, and know practically the obstacles that have been in its way for the past twenty years. Under such circumstances it would be but natural that I should feel a deep interest in this matter. I believe, sir, that I never should have been in Congress if it had not been for my devotion to the interest of the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries; if it had not been for my devotion to an uninterrupted river commerce and a free opening to the Gulf of Mexico.

The city which I have the honor in part to represent is also vitally interested in the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi, from the fact that more than half of her commerce is upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The people of the State which I in part represent, being in the center of the valley of the Mississippi, I am sure from what is said by its Representatives here upon this floor, and from the tone of the press of the State, are more interested in an uninterrupted and open river at its mouth than they are in any subject that has been considered by this Congress. And I believe, sir, that the States throughout the Mississippi Valley, from the Gulf of Mexico to the British possessions, if we can take as exponents of the public feeling upon this subject the resolves of conventions which have been held to promote the interests of the opening of the Mississippi and of its improvement, are also interested in this subject as they are in no other. And I may state from what I have observed that the people of the entire valley have become restive during the past few months, because Congress has delayed the consideration of this subject so long.

I am satisfied, gentlemen of the West and of the South, that if this Congress adjourns, having done nothing for the opening of the mouth of the Mississippi River, we will receive such a rebuke from our constituents as no other members of Congress have received who have had the honor to represent them upon this floor; for when we came here the subjects of finance and of transportation were the engrossing topics of public consideration. We have gone on six months and nothing has been done practically as yet upon these two important subjects. But I hope that before this Congress adjourns, if it shall not be until next November, we will see that we have provided in the near future additional transportation facilities for the great and growing commerce of the Mississippi Valley States and of the entire country.

Why should the people of the Mississippi Valley feel such a deep interest in this matter? If you will look over the statistics for the past thirty years you will see, you will find, that during the first ten of the past thirty years the production of the Mississippi Valley States more than doubled in that decade; that it doubled in the next decade up to 1860, until an annual product was reached of six hundred million bushels of cereals; and that in the decade from 1860 to 1870 it nearly doubled again, amounting to a thousand million bushels. Those who have been observant of the increase in population of these great cereal-producing States for the past thirty years have become satisfied, judging by the past and taking into consideration that the population during the decade from 1860 to 1870 increased 60 per cent., that the cereal-producing States of the West must have better facilities for water transportation or be left at the entire mercy of monopolies, receiving no remuneration for their industries; that this great, broad expanse of country, extending from the Alleghany Mountains to the Rocky Mountains, a basin of over a thousand miles in width, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Falls of Saint Anthony, more than two thousand miles in length—that this country which I have been describing is to be the hope of the people of the entire world who want happy and prosperous homes. You might as well undertake to chain the lightnings of the heavens or arrest the current of falling thunderbolts as to arrest the current of emigration to the westward, and before the half of our second centennial shall have passed sixty million people will live in this great valley and west of it.

I say, judging from the past, observing the increasing productions for the past thirty years, taking into consideration that only 17 per cent. of the lands of these States are now cultivated, if there is now such a demand for additional facilities for transportation in this country, there is a necessity that we should not only provide for the present, but that it is imperative that we should provide for the very near future. No new railroad trunk lines running from the West to the East are now being constructed. Those already built are being taxed to their utmost capacity, and the idea must come rushing upon every thoughtful mind, it seems to me, of the necessity of additional and cheaper transportation facilities for this country. We believe that they can come through the improvement of the Mississippi River better than in any other way, that they can be secured with less expenditure of money in this way than in any other.

There have been two plans suggested for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River. I have regretted, with many other gentlemen, that we were not united upon the question as to how the mouth of the river should be improved; but I hope before this discussion ends, or before a vote is taken, that we will yet unite upon one of these two plans that have been presented for our consideration, and that this Congress will not adjourn without having provided the ways and means for the commencement of this work.

I desire, sir, to read in brief the essence of the provisions of the bill which has been reported by the majority of the Committee on Railways and Canals. I refer to what is known as the Eads or jetty bill. It provides that the considerations therein prescribed being complied with—I ask the attention of the House to the point as to how this money is to be paid—"the United States hereby agrees to pay the said Eads and his associates, or to his or their assignees or to his or their legal representatives, $2,000,000 twelve months after there is permanently obtained twenty-two feet of water; $1,000,000 one year after obtaining twenty-four feet of water; $1,000,000 after maintaining for one year twenty-six feet of water, and $1,000,000 after obtaining twenty-eight feet of water." In the bill two instances, however, that is to say in obtaining twenty-six feet of water, that depth has to be maintained for fifteen months before any money is paid, and the twenty-eight feet of water have to be maintained for twenty-four months or two years before the last million dollars is paid. The bill then provides that three years after twenty-eight feet of water have been secured and maintained another million dollars shall be paid, and a year after that another million, and in the fifth year $600,000, and in the sixth year $600,000.

Now, sir, it is an important consideration that at this time, when there is a great cry for economy in public expenditures, and rightly so, that to begin with there is no money to be paid until the work is accomplished, and no money to be paid until it has been maintained one year. And it is probable that the Government of the United States now, when its Treasury is so depleted, will not have to pay a dollar for three years, and then the payment is to be distributed throughout the next seven years, so that the Government really will not feel the expenditure; whereas at this time the appropriation of eight or ten million dollars, to be expended in the next two or three years, our people might have a right to complain of under the circumstances. But of the expenditure proposed under this bill there can be no just cause for complaint, and more especially as no money is to be paid unless the work is accomplished.

Something was said yesterday in reference to Mr. Eads and his associates taking no chances in this matter, and that in case of failure there would be an application to Congress to reimburse them for the money they have expended in a fruitless enterprise. I would say in this connection, in answer to that suggestion, that although Mr. Eads is a constituent of mine, I now give him notice and give notice to this House, that if I were here or had any influence with any man that should be here during the next five or ten years I would vote against and protest against paying him and his associates one dollar in case of failure, as this is a contract if the bill is passed. And I think that he should understand to-day, and that Congress should understand, that he and his associates are taking the chances, as they are willing to do and as they propose to do; and those who know Mr. Eads know that he is not a man to plead the "baby act."

Mr. Speaker, reference has been made by gentlemen who have spoken before me to the distinguished Corps of Engineers, in whom we have always put so much confidence and by whose recommendation money has always been appropriated and expended. Sir, I have as much faith in those engineers and as much recognize the importance of having an engineer corps as perhaps any member upon this floor. But I do not believe that it necessarily follows that after a committee have thoroughly investigated a subject and have heard practical men for days and weeks and perhaps longer discussing any subject, that we should under all circumstances rely entirely upon the Engineer Corps. I do not believe that there is a man here who would rise in his place and say that there should be no opportunity for our civil engineers to compete in any of these great enterprises with the engineers of the Army. I do not believe that they would establish the precedent that in a matter of such great importance, where engineering skill and science are needed, the matter should be left entirely to a board of seven or eight men.

We send our children, our boys, to the schools and colleges of the country, hoping as we watch their progress that, even if they do not have the advantage of graduating at a military academy of the Government, still they will have opportunities in the grand race of life, and in competing with others throughout the country. You might as well establish the precedent that a lawyer should not practice in the United States courts unless he has graduated at a United States academy. If it can be shown to reasonable men, to men who have an interest in these matters, that our civil engineers have better views and more extended experience and observation upon subjects of such public importance, then we should rely upon their judgment and not establish the arbitrary rule that we must employ a Government engineer in all cases.

It will be remembered that a little more than a year ago, after this subject of cheap transportation had been discussed at great length in the Senate of the United States, and after the people of the entire country had been aroused, the Senate appointed a committee known as the Senate Transportation Committee. That committee have been giving their almost undivided attention to the commercial wants of the country, seeking to put themselves in a situation where they may be able to report intelligently to the Senate of the United States not only the best means of improving the mouth of the Mississippi River, but the most practicable method of affording facilities to other sections of this country for additional transportation. That committee have had this subject under very careful consideration, and I understand they have made a unanimous report in favor of the jetty or the Eads plan.

I will speak for a moment of the advantages of the jetty plan over the canal plan, should it prove to be a success. The commerce of the Mississippi River is already very great and it is increasing daily. And every man knows, who knows anything of business, that it would be infinitely better if we could have an uninterrupted passage out of the mouth of the Mississippi River than to be obliged to force our ships and steamers through a narrow canal, with locks, &c.; and I believe it is worth the experiment. There are enough advantages to accrue, if it shall be a success, to pay for this experiment. And if it shall not be a success, ultimately it will be worth what it will cost to demonstrate that fact to the country.

Mention has been made of the importance to the city of New Orleans of opening the mouth of the Mississippi River. I am as anxious for the prosperity of the city of New Orleans, for it to be a thrifty and prosperous city, as any man upon this floor. I have seen that city in its palmy days, when its people were successful and thrifty, when prosperity was theirs, the same as it was of the rest of the country. And I can very readily understand that if the Mississippi River is so improved that sea-going vessels from the entire world can go up to New Orleans, not only will the vast importations needed for the valley be brought there upon those ships, but they will be laden with immigrants seeking homes in this country. And if there is anything that the South needs to-day it is population and general prosperity, and if vessels can freely go up that river with immigrants, they will be very much more likely to settle and make their homes in the South than now when they land almost exclusively in northern ports.

I hope as many immigrants will continue to land at northern ports as heretofore, for I have no sectional jealousy. I believe the population of the country will gradually and rapidly increase. I would like to see immigrants come to our northern and southern ports, and our whole country densely populated. Then the Southern States, instead of having $150,000,000 worth of cotton to export each year, will have $400,000,000 worth. And in that way we would not only be rendering a great benefit to the people of this portion of our country, but to the entire country, by the increased production of an article that goes largely abroad, and that would create a large trade balance in our favor.

As I have already said, I hope that we will unite upon some bill before we adjourn. I shall vote for the jetty bill. If that is lost, then I shall vote for the next best thing to my mind, and that is the canal. Seeing that my time has expired, I thank the House for their kind attention to my desultory remarks, and will yield the floor to others who may follow me.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the attention of the House for a few moments upon this subject, and then I will yield to others who may wish to express their views.

In my opinion there has been no question of such importance before this House to the interests of the western and southern people as the one now pending. The valley of the Mississippi and its tributaries is a great empire. It represents and will represent forever the great central region of our country. All its industries, all its interests, center there; and all its diversified industries will flow out from it to the East and West, the North and South, as from the great mart of the nation.

This is no new question presented to the Congress of the United States. It has been the subject of contemplation in all the Congresses heretofore since the commencement of the Government. I have not the time, nor have I the strength this afternoon, to follow out this subject as it has been presented from the beginning. I desire to say only that the Government, year by year, almost every year since 1824, has expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in keeping open the mouth of the Mississippi River. Heretofore they have always failed to make a channel for the transportation of the products of the Mississippi Valley. In the opinion of all engineers, whether they belong to the Army or are in civil life, the present plan has failed, and always will fail, to keep an open channel to the Gulf and thence to the ocean. There has been expended between four and five million dollars in the effort to open and keep open the mouths of the Mississippi River. They were temporary expedients, and have always been held to be such.

The work of a month, the work of six months, the work of a year, the work of two years, the result of any greater or less expenditure of time and labor, are and always have been, under the present temporizing system, liable to be swept away by any one hurricane, by any one cyclone of the Gulf. Thus the whole bar may be changed in a day or two days, and all the work previously done must be repeated.

What is the present system which has been followed for so many years by the Government? It is by means of dredges, or at present by means of a revolving screw worked by machinery, to stir a little space in the vast mouth of the Mississippi and roil the water so that the current on those days when it is strong enough may carry out this raised deposit into the deeper places in the Gulf. That is all, no more, no less; the work of a little fluttering wheel to stir up the deposits, trusting then to the current of the river, sometimes great and sometimes small, and sometimes with the incoming tide no current at all, to carry out this deposit which is made there, as has been shown to the House, by thousands and thousands of square feet every day.

This process, then, must be given up. It is too expensive and it is entirely inadequate. The wants of millions of people require a better remedy. The demand of the nation is for some more efficient work. We have expended on the Mississippi and its tributaries over $17,000,000 to make it navigable for the already vast commerce of the Mississippi Valley; yet though we improve the tributaries, though we make the Mississippi River more readily navigable, the bars at its mouth as effectually close the commerce of that river to the world as if there were no mouth there, practically.

That is the problem which we are called upon to consider; that is the problem which the Committee on Commerce during the five years I have had the honor to be one of its members has tried to master. Last year that committee made a very elaborate report, which is printed and is now within the reach of members, in favor of a new system for opening that river. The committee then pointed out what seemed to them the least expensive, the surest, and the most successful way of accomplishing that purpose—the construction of a canal near Fort Saint Philip. The arguments in favor of that plan, together with its necessity, will all be found in that report of the Committee on Commerce. I will not dwell upon them. The considerations demanding such an improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi, through one of its channels or by a canal, were collected with great care by members of the committee and by gentlemen interested in the subject. I refer the House to that report—which I have not now time to dwell upon in detail—for further information on this subject.

The Committee on Commerce during the last session of Congress found itself so overwhelmed with business in looking after the interior waters of the States—the harbors, the entrances to harbors, and other questions of commerce coming before them—that they requested the appointment of some other committee to take charge of this question of opening water communication by means of artificial canals. Hence this matter was referred at the opening of this session to the Committee on Railways and Canals. And I believe that that committee, having called before them the more distinguished engineers of the country, both civil and military; having called before them representatives of chambers of commerce, of boards of trade, people from all parts of the West and the South, and intelligent men from near and far, have given this subject more consideration than the Committee on Commerce had time or could give to it if it had been left to them, and have done their work well in gathering together the information to lay before this House. But to-day that committee finds itself, as the Committee on Commerce has frequently found itself during the last five years, unable to determine what particular system to adopt, although all are agreed as to the vast importance to the United States and to the valley of the Mississippi of devising some plan of removing the obstacles to the commerce of that vast empire; and they now come before the House, as the Committee on Commerce have frequently done, with a divided force and with different plans. I regret this most sincerely. So long ago as 1870, in considering the question of the policy of the Government in regard to the improvement, not only of the Mississippi but in regard to every river and harbor in the United States, I took occasion to state to the House my views on the vast importance of opening the mouth of the Mississippi to the commerce of the world. I expressed my hope then that it would be speedily done; and yet to-day, with the little funnel which whirls and whirls at the end of our steamboats stirring the mud merely in one or the other of the channels, we are apparently no nearer the solution of this question than we were then or than we were fifty years ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this House should gather from engineers, in whatever station in life they may have been placed, all their best judgment, all their best information, all their best knowledge. They should spread it before this House, and the members should consider it as the best of all the information they could obtain. Why, sir, what necessity is there here that my friend should attack the Corps of Army Engineers, whose lives have been devoted to the solution of just such questions as this on every river and in every harbor where expenditures of money have been made by the Government, and who have devoted their lives as honestly and faithfully as men ever did in this world, from pride and from honor and from duty, to further these great commercial and navigation interests of the United States? What necessity, I say, is there for attacking them in the solution of such a question as this? And, on the other hand, what necessity is there for attacking the reputation of one of the most distinguished engineers that the world ever has produced, and who proposes a plan which he believes, in common with many other engineers, will provide a satisfactory solution of this vast and important question. Is it not trivial, is it not unworthy of the Representatives of the people, that we should spend our time in breaking down the reputation of men who have devoted long lives of labor to the solution of questions involving the interests of the American people, instead of giving our attention to selecting, with the aid of the information which they present to us, the best means in our judgment to overcome the difficulty.

Now, sir, I would gather from every means of information, from every report, from every experiment that ever has been made, from the commencement of civilization down to the present time, bearing upon that subject, what will guide us aright, whether it be at the mouth of the Danube or the Rhone or the Nile or the Mississippi, or wherever else human ingenuity has endeavored to act with nature or against nature in opening the great highways of commerce. With these views, sir, I have nothing to antagonize in this bill, and I have nothing to say for it or against it, except so far as a continuous study for years upon this subject may have enabled me to form some conclusions for myself; and if I venture to present those to the House, they, I trust, will take them as they will any opinion or any other information, as going to make up the sum of information upon which their judgment can rely.

The mouth of the Mississippi River is unlike the mouth of any other river upon the face of the globe as regards its immense deposits of earthy matter, amounting to hundreds of thousands of square miles, a thousand feet deep. The delta of the Nile, which has given its name to this special formation, is insignificant compared with that of the Mississippi River. I do not know how far up it was an open sea once; but those who are familiar with it know where the solid banks commence and where the vast alluvium spreads out that makes States now, spreading across Louisiana and Texas and into Alabama and into Arkansas, making a great territory, which was once a gulf, but which is now dry land. For ages that process of filling up the mouth of the Mississippi, not the little paltry mouths that we speak of to-day, but that vast arm of the sea, as large almost as the rest of the Gulf of Mexico, has been going on.

Why, sir, it is within a near period geologically that the waters of the great lakes passed out into the Mississippi. I can look from my own home and I can see the banks of the Saint Clair River, where, if a dam could be placed across it now eighteen feet high, or at the most twenty feet above the surface of the river, there would no water pass down into Lake Erie, and none from there into the Niagara. The time was and is almost now when a boat would have passed from Lake Michigan into the waters of the Mississippi. The whole vast lake region, ay, even the Hudson Bay region itself, was once tributary to the waters which flow down the Mississippi Valley to the Gulf and to the ocean.

But it has filled up by carrying down the vast thousands of acres of land from the Mississippi and its tributaries. This has filled up that great arm of the Gulf for perhaps a hundred miles above New Orleans. I will not state exactly how far, but this delta of the Mississippi has been filled up by carrying on and on these deposits through successive ages until it has formed land enough for an empire there, and it is still moving onward and onward toward the Antilles. Since the first report that was made on this subject the mouths of the Mississippi have advanced ten or fifteen miles. Now, this has been the work of nature, and gentlemen can see what they will have to contend with in meeting the requirements of engineering there, when they remember that that vast empire of earth has been deposited at the mouths of this river, and is being deposited every day as it has been for the last thousand years. Who shall solve this problem in a moment? What engineer can go over that vast field, over this vast river carrying down in solution and sweeping from its bottom enough to make a county in a day? Who shall solve the engineering problem in a day and escape criticism? It never has been done successfully, and if solved at all it must be by experience joined with knowledge.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot dwell upon the facts connected with this subject any further, nor do I desire to go further. The facts I have stated show, as was said by a gentleman who preceded me, that we should work in some manner with nature which makes these vast deposits. But the question is, how shall we work with nature and in what direction shall we have the advantage of the operations of nature? I admit that if there was a strong current in either direction sweeping past the delta of the mouth of the Mississippi, which carried off this immense deposit as it comes out into the gulf as there is at the delta of the Danube, the solution of the question would be much easier than it is. But let any man take the map of Louisiana, and the map of the Mississippi, and see its progress from where it left the highlands to its mouth and he need not have an engineer to tell him that there never was a littoral current. There never has been such a current at all. If there had this vast deposit would have been either to the right or to the left of its mouth. If there had been, of course, it would have made a corresponding channel which would have kept its course through the deposit. But the general direction of the current has been onward and onward continually a little east of south. That is its direction to-day. Islands have been formed; territory large enough for States has been formed, by the onward course of the Mississippi, through the vast alluvial plains which would have been changed by a littoral current, while the channel of the river has been generally in one direction. It needs no engineer with a drag in the water to tell where the current has been for ages past and where it is to-day.

Now I call the attention of the gentlemen of the House to the map accompanying the report of the engineers, showing the progress of the shoal water in this delta of the Mississippi. Since 1838 this deposit has gone on from the edge where it broke off into deep water, and between two and a half and three miles of the whole bar, as it is called, has advanced before the deep current and has spread out sideways and in front toward Cuba. Since the survey, which was well made in 1838, it has advanced nearly three miles, not right at the mouth of the river, but the whole vast bank of deposit has been spread forward. It goes forward at the rate of four hundred and seventy feet a year. And more than this, where the water is five hundred feet deep there are ridges like the ridges of mountains forming all the while, which rise and rise until they are within fourteen or fifteen feet of the surface and the valleys between them fill up. That is the result of the deposit there.

Now, this filling up is progressing at the rate I have stated, and all these circumstances have to be taken into account when we would solve the question of an open mouth to the Mississippi. O, if there was a rocky coast there; if there were jetties made there by nature which would hold the water of the river in one or two channels, which would carry it into the Gulf where the water is deep, then there would be no difficulty in having an open mouth to the river.

Now, as no one disputes the general facts in regard to this matter, let gentlemen of this House consider the character of the mouth of this river, the soft alluvial soil constantly forming there and constantly swayed by the great hurricanes and cyclones of the Gulf bearing up against these channels. All of these things, about which I have not time to speak in detail, must be considered by every intelligent man in this House before he can settle a question of this kind to any certainty. It must be examined by engineers, and therefore I say it is not only unkind but unmanly to attack an engineer who brings study and investigation to the solving of this problem, even if he does not agree with the views of others who look at it from a different or contrary direction.

I will not talk of the probability of success of the jetty plan. I have myself no doubt that with a sufficient expenditure of money for building jetties, which are but artificial banks for the river, you may accomplish a success. I have no doubt that a channel may be made, if the jetties extend back toward the higher land far enough to throw the current between them, as if they were the river banks, and keep the channel scoured out so as to secure twenty, thirty, or fifty feet of water if necessary.

I have also no doubt that if those jetties were constructed, the very concentration of the water between the jetties, if they should be made ftrong enough to stand there against the hurricanes—and I believe they might be made strong enough to withstand them—the concentration of water in the channels between the jetties would carry a larger amount of deposit toward the mouth of the river and increase still faster the formation of the bed of alluvial soil at the mouth and in the Gulf. I have no doubt, and I think no one doubts, that in any event the system of jettying must be carried forward year by year, at a greater or less expense, in order to secure the necessary depth of water in the channel. I believe that is a fair, honest statement of the matter, one which from my investigation of the matter I cannot gainsay. How much that expenditure may be no one can tell. Men may risk their judgment upon the matter; men may undertake, or be willing to undertake, the forming of these jetties with their knowledge of engineering, may be willing to undertake them for a given sum. But I venture to say that no man, unless he knows that the Almighty with His strong hand will withhold the hurricane and stop the cyclone from beating across the mouth of the Mississippi River, can tell or dare venture to tell how soon any work of man may be swept off into the Gulf and rendered useless.

I leave to others the advocacy of the jetty scheme. I appreciate the importance and the necessity, if there were no other means, of expending money to any amount to open the mouth of the Mississippi River for the commerce of the vast empire that lies between the mountains. I leave to others to explain the amount which may be necessary to keep this river open by this means, and to explain its feasibility. I do not antagonize it, because, although some other plan within the means of the Government may be now adopted, I have no doubt that the time will come when the millions of men in the valley of the Mississippi and of the great lakes will say to this Government that if any human engineering can accomplish it the mouth of the Mississippi shall be opened to the vessels and the commerce of the world.

But there is a point where if it be only temporary—and by that I mean the life-time of those who hear me—there is a point where no one will dispute the practicability of making a safe and sufficient passage from the deep water of the river to the deep water of the Gulf. The same process which has piled up this earth brought down by the Mississippi into dry land from which States have been formed, has made islands farther out into the Gulf, which are a protection to Breton Bay, some forty miles up the river, where there are some three or four miles of dry land between the deep water of the river and the deep water of the Gulf.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. How deep is the water of the Gulf at that point?

Mr. CONGER. I am informed that in its shoalest place it is some six or seven fathoms in depth, deep enough for all the wants of commerce.

Mr. HURLBUT. You do not mean in the Gulf?

Mr. CONGER. I mean in Breton Bay.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is thirty-five feet there.

Mr. CONGER. There may be places where it is thirty-five feet; I will not dispute that. But in the present state of navigation thirty-five feet is all that is necessary. Of course it is not all an even bottom; it has its channels. It is not filling up however, because the mouths of the river have passed on below for forty miles with land intervening, where the river flows out with all its deposits into the Gulf beyond. Breton Bay is secluded from the general action of the hurricanes and storms of the Gulf by Breton and other islands. It has itself a harbor large enough for all the commerce that would ever seek entrance there. There is a strip of land three or four miles wide, but it shoals off into the Gulf, so that to build the canal there would require some seven miles of canalling to secure twenty-seven or twenty-eight feet of water. What is the character of this deposit? It is sufficiently firm now to make firm land. But whether there be quicksands there which would obstruct the building of a canal is a question which engineers have not determined. Whatever difficulties there may be, it is not disputed but what they may be overcome, and a canal constructed seven miles long from the river, where the water is one hundred and fifty feet deep, to the bay, where the water is thirty-five feet deep in the shoalest places. The general difference between the water-level in the river and in the Gulf I think is only two or three feet in ordinary stages of water.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ORR.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I have but a word or two more to say on this subject.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to occupy other gentlemen's time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to say a word in regard to the construction of a lock or gate in connection with the canal. By this means the current of the Mississippi, even at the highest stages of the water, could not pass into the canal except when the boats were passing; and although some deposit might thus be carried suspended in the water into the canal, it would be so comparatively small in amount as never to injure materially the canal or the depth of water in Breton Bay.

It is asked how many of these boats could pass the locks in a day. Of the size proposed here there could pass two or three ordinary boats through the locks at one time. There would be but one real lock. I think the lockage would be no impediment to commerce. There now pass through the locks of the Sault Sainte Marie Canal a larger number of vessels (and although they are smaller each requires its lockage) than would pass through this deep canal into the Mississippi at that point. I think there would be no difficulty arising from the delay occasioned by lockage. That is a matter about which other gentlemen can satisfy themselves.

Now, while I believe the time is coming when some way will be provided (and perhaps the very way which this distinguished engineer, Mr. Eads, has recommended) for making some one of the mouths of the Mississippi a deep channel for the commerce of the world, yet I submit that we are now spending almost every ten years, certainly every twenty years, enough money to construct this canal which is feasible. We might construct this work, and then as the country demands it go on with these jetties—improving the mouth of the Mississippi hereafter for the commerce of the world as the nation grows and becomes better able to undertake the cost and risk of so vast a work.

I ask gentlemen to consider this fact: that at the point proposed, or some point near Fort Saint Philip, a canal seven miles long can be made for a moderate sum—a canal by means of which vessels of largest draught coming into any of our ports can enter and pass in a storm out of the Mississippi. This can be done at a moderate expense. Again, this is a very great distance nearer for all the eastern trade of the United States—the ocean trade—than the communication by the mouth. Making use of the mouth you have to go forty miles, then pass around the shoals and get back almost in a line with the eastern trade, making a difference of perhaps one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles. At the mouths of the Mississippi, whether there be any jetties there or not, there is no harbor. No vessel can lie there. Vessels must lie off and on until the wind permits them to make an entrance. But at Breton Bay they can run into a safe harbor, and be there ready to go out or come in. They can enter the canal in almost any stage of wind or water.

I submit this proposition to gentlemen: suppose there were at the Isthmus of Darien a strip of land seven miles wide, and but a few feet higher than the level of the two oceans. How long would it have been before the commerce of the world would have demanded that a canal seven miles long should be built across that isthmus? When the subject had once been presented to the commercial nations of the world, how many days would have elapsed before they would have agreed upon a canal to avoid the dangers of the cape and the dangers of the ocean? Why, sir, such a canal would have been finished years ago, and our vessels would have been sweeping back and forth through that canal bearing the commerce of two oceans. Of vastly more importance (though on a smaller scale) to the people of the Mississippi Valley is the removal of the little narrow strip of land that divides the deep waters of the Mississippi from the sufficiently deep waters of Breton Bay and the Gulf.

I have not time, Mr. Speaker, to dwell on this question further. In what I have said I have sought not to antagonize the views of any other gentleman who has spoken, but to fulfill a duty to myself in the expression of the views which have arisen in my mind during the four or five years that I have been a member of the Committee on Commerce and also a member of the sub-committee upon the improvement of rivers and harbors. I thank the House for the attention it has given me.

[Mr. COBB, of Kansas, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HURLBUT. If no other gentleman desires to continue the debate, I propose now to call the previous question.

Mr. STORM. I hope the gentleman will now move that the House take a recess, as we are to have an evening session.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] agree that I shall have fifteen minutes on this question to-morrow morning?

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no objection to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] or any other gentleman having as much time as the House may give them. But as I will only have an hour for closing debate, I do not think that I should be asked to give the time out of my hour.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to have it arranged that I shall have fifteen minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] who reported the substitute, may have half an hour in addition to the hour allowed to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] inasmuch as that gentleman, having charge of the bill, wishes to occupy the whole hour himself after the main question is ordered.

Mr. MCCRARY. If that arrangement be made I will yield to my colleague [Mr. KASSON] the time which he desires.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that arrangement will be made; that after the previous question is seconded the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] shall have half an hour in addition to the hour allowed to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] to close debate.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on seconding the previous question.

Mr. MCCRARY. That will include the amendments?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to have the privilege of having an amendment pending.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. SENER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to have his amendment printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. HURLBUT. I will allow the gentleman's amendment to be read, but I do not say that I will accept it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will hand in my amendment to the Clerk. I ask that it may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order to-morrow after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire also to submit a special report to accompany the bill, and ask that it may be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BECK. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists;

An act (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain;

An act (S. No. 708) to change the name of the schooner China; and

An act (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The House, pursuant to the order made yesterday, will meet this evening for debate in relation to the Washington national monument, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. SENER. And also the bill in relation to the monument to the mother of Washington.

Mr. DUNNELL. May not other subjects be debated also?

The SPEAKER. If nobody objects, but gentlemen desiring to speak upon the special assignments will have precedence.

Mr. HURLBUT. I suppose that when debate is exhausted on those bills it will be in order upon other questions.

Mr. CONGER. Has any arrangement been proposed by which we can have the morning hour to-morrow for private bills?

The SPEAKER. It will come up immediately after the bill in relation to the Mississippi River is disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. Then the next thing in order will be the unfinished business of the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER. What unfinished business?

Mr. CONGER. The bill for the relief of Rollin White.

The SPEAKER. That bill is in the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Will it come up before or after the bill in relation to the Mississippi River is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. After that bill is disposed of; that bill will come up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CONGER. Then the Rollin White bill will be the next thing in order?

The SPEAKER. It will. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] will occupy the chair this evening as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. FIELD occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore.)

WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In pursuance of the order of the House made yesterday the House meets to-night to consider the report of the Special Committee on the Washington National Monument, and also the report in relation to a monument to Mary, the mother of Washington.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, seventy-four years ago, on the 23d of last December, the Congress of the United States, in response to a universal feeling throughout the nation, resolved to erect a marble monument at the capital, so designed as to commemorate the great events of the military and political life of George Washington.

The whole people were in mourning for the loss of the man who by common consent was regarded as the Father of his Country; the man of whom it was said, without exciting the envy of a living soul, that he was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

When Congress resolved to commemorate the great events of this man's life, they imposed a solemn as well as pleasing duty upon all who were to come after them until that duty should be performed. At this distance of time, looking back along the path of our history, and remembering the vicissitudes through which efforts to carry out that pledge have passed, and turning my face toward that unfinished column, standing with bowed head upon the banks of the Potomac, I wonder what great and stirring events must have interposed to prevent the consummation of this sacred duty.

George Washington died on the 14th day of December, 1799. No man who has ever lived occupied a larger space in history or had a greater and more salutary influence upon the lives of men. Upon his death not only the whole American people, but the civilized world, mourned his loss as one of the greatest and best of earth. The President, Mr. Adams, announced the distressing event to Congress in a message, in which he speaks of the purity of Washington's character and the long series of services to his country as having rendered him illustrious throughout the world. The letter which brought the sad intelligence to the President, and which was transmitted by him to Congress, was written from Mount Vernon, December 15, by Tobias Lear, who was with Washington in his last hours. The letter states:

> His last scene corresponded with the whole tenor of his life; not a groan nor a complaint escaped him in extreme distress. With perfect resignation, and with full possession of his reason, he closed his well-spent life.

There is to me, Mr. Speaker, a melancholy pleasure in reviewing this striking event of our early history, and I dare say the House will not feel the half-hour misspent which is given to revive the recollection of this now almost obscure passage.

I shall not myself speak particularly of the life and character of Washington; but what I shall say upon that theme I prefer shall be from the lips of those who were his associates in arms, his companions in the struggles of our early revolutionary period.

Both Houses of Congress waited upon the President to condole with him on the distressing event. In their address to the President, the Senate said:

> With patriotic pride we review the life of our Washington, and compare him with those of other countries who have been pre-eminent in fame. Ancient and modern names are diminished before him. Greatness and guilt have too often been allied; but his fame is wider than it is brilliant. The destroyers of nations stood abashed at the majesty of his virtue. It reproved the intemperance of their ambition, and darkened the splendor of victory. The scene is closed, and we are no longer anxious lest misfortune should sully his glory. He has traveled on to the end of his journey and carried with him an increasing weight of honor; he has deposited it safely where misfortune cannot tarnish it, where malice cannot blast it. Favored of heaven, he departed without exhibiting the weakness of humanity. Magnanimous in death, the darkness of the grave could not obscure his brightness. * * * Let his countrymen consecrate the memory of the heroic general, the patriotic statesman, and the virtuous sage. Let them teach their children never to forget that the fruit of his labors and his example are their inheritance.

In reply, among other things, Mr. Adams said:

> In the multitude of my thoughts and recollections on this melancholy event, you will permit me only to say that I have seen him in the days of adversity, in some of the scenes of his deepest distress and most trying perplexities; I have also attended him in his highest elevation and most prosperous felicity, with uniform admiration of his wisdom, moderation, and constancy. * * * * * *
> Among all our original associates in that memorable League of the Continent in 1774, which has expressed the sovereign will of a free nation in America, he was the only one remaining in the General Government.

And, in conclusion, added:

> His example is now complete, and it will teach wisdom and virtue to magistrates, citizens, and men, not only in the present age, but in future generations as long as our history shall be read. If a Trajan found a Pliny, a Marcus Aurelius can never want biographers, eulogists, or historians.

It was a proper thing; indeed, less could hardly have been done than to resolve to erect a monument worthy of the character of such a man. And it perh aps may be as well for me to occupy my time chiefly in presenting to the House the vicissitudes through which the effort to erect a monument has passed, leaving other gentlemen to treat other branches of the subject. It is an instructive chapter; and while it carries with it a lesson not flattering to our patriotism, it may serve to point a moral, if it does not adorn a tale.

In announcing the death of Washington to the House, Mr. Marshall closed an eloquent address by submitting a series of resolutions befitting the occasion. One of these resolutions provided for the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses to report measures suitable to the occasion; and in that resolution occurs the memorable words, applicable to Washington only, declaring that these measures shall be expressive of the profound sorrow with which Congress is penetrated in the loss of a citizen "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."* The Senate concurred in this resolution, the committee was appointed, and among other things done was the passage unanimously upon the same day of an act to erect a marble monument to Washington.

May 8, of the same session, Mr. Lee, of the committee on the part of the House, reported in favor of carrying out the resolution of Congress, passed in 1783, respecting an equestrian statue of Washington, and also to erect a marble monument to carry out the act of 1799. A motion was made to amend the report and carried, substituting a mausoleum for the statue and monument proposed. On the next day Mr. Evans, from the committee, reported a bill for erecting a mausoleum, which was to be one hundred feet square at the base and of proportionate height. The bill came before the House on final passage May 10, and passed—yeas 54, nays 19. On reaching the Senate, it was postponed, May 12, to the following session.

Congress assembled on the 17th of November in its second session, and on the 26th Mr. Lee moved a committee, with instructions to report measures to "carry into execution the resolution of Congress, passed the last session, in commemoration of the great events, military and political, in the life of George Washington;" and on the 2d of December Mr. Lee reported a bill to erect a mausoleum. The bill directed that it should be of marble, erected in the city of Washington, under the superintendence of the four Secretaries. The question was considered in Committee of the Whole December 5, when a motion was made to substitute a marble monument to be erected in the Capitol building; but Mr. Lee reminded the House that at the last session, after a long debate, they had declared in favor of a mausoleum; and that as no reasons had been assigned for a change of opinion, he hoped they would persevere in the deliberate result of their judgment.

It was urged by Mr. Griswold that—

> It was the object of the bill to raise a monument which should last for ages, and which should be a perpetual memorial of the gratitude of America. Such would not be the case if the proposition made by the gentleman from North Carolina should be adopted. The monument proposed by him might be broken and destroyed by a lawless mob; and for his part he would not consent to raise such a monument to the memory of a man who had deserved so well of his country. * * * It is true that it will not perpetuate the fame of Washington; his fame required nothing which we could do to give it perpetuity; but it will perpetuate the gratitude of the country. * * * It was undoubtedly a subject of sentiment; and subjects of such a kind must be guided by feeling. Various opinions therefore may naturally be expected. His opinion was that the national sentiment called for the erection of a structure to correspond in size with the character of the man to whom it was raised.

Mr. Lee, who had been a companion in arms with Washington, and was the chosen orator of Congress on the occasion of his death, came to the support of his bill with a stirring, patriotic appeal to the House, in which he said that should this honorable spirit, kindled by an enthusiasm in the virtues and talents of our departed benefactor, subside and be chilled by the adoption of the amendment, he would condole with the House, and would rather they would be silent forever than disgrace themselves and their country by so subordinate an act. And, rising with his theme and in glowing eloquence, he continued:

> It is true, sir, that the celebrity and the glory of Washington hang not on our plaudits. History will transmit to posterity the luster of his fame, glittering with untarnished purity. It is not in our power either to increase or diminish it. But, sir, we may imitate his virtues and his great example. We are deeply interested in holding them forth as illustrious models to our sons. Is there, then, I ask you, any other mode for perpetuating the memory of such transcendent virtues so strong, so impressive, as that which we propose? The grandeur of the pile we wish to raise will impress a sublime awe in all who behold it. It will survive the present generation; it will receive the homage of our children's children, and they will learn that the truest way to gain honor amid a free people is to be useful, to be virtuous.
> This will not be the act of an individual. It will be the act of a government, expressing the will of a great nation. Seize, then, I pray you, seize with rapture the occasion that is now presented, thankful to the Supreme Disposer of Events for giving you the opportunity for rearing some future Washington. This is a great object. Frown, then, upon all the little efforts made to defeat it.

The House again, December 10, in Committee of the Whole, had the same bill under consideration. On this occasion many gentlemen participated in the debate. Mr. Claiborne, among others, said:

> That on a question which would not fail to excite the sensibility of every American heart it was a subject of great regret that a division of sentiment should arise, and he urged the House to unite in the last act of attention which they proposed to show this venerable character.

But while Mr. Claiborne urged—and in this the human nature in him is found repeated here and elsewhere daily—while he urged the House to unite in their action, he spoke to convince them that it was their duty to build an equestrian statue in accordance with the resolution of the Continental Congress, utterly ignoring the pledge of the Congress of which he was then a member.

The committee agreed to inquire into his suggestion, as well as others, and arose and reported progress.

Again, December 19, Mr. Lee reported to the House that the committee had considered the several propositions made commemorative of the services of Washington, but that it adhered to its former report as to a mausoleum; that they had maturely considered the merits of all the plans proposed and preferred the mausoleum, as well from its superior durability as cheapness, to any other.

December 23 the question was again before the House in Committee of the Whole, and a motion was made fixing the sum to be appropriated at $200,000.

Mr. Smilie opposed it as a needless expenditure of money; that no responsible architect or engineer had given security that the work could be accomplished for the sum named.

Mr. Harper replied that the old story was again rung in their ears. He said:

> An object in itself highly important was proposed, and forsooth because it cost some money, on the ground of economy it must be rejected. * * * * * * *
> These clamorous objections are well understood. Their sole object was ad captandum vulgus, to create alarm about what was termed useless expense. They were intended for nothing else.

In looking over the Annals of Congress, disclosing discussion upon this question, Mr. Speaker, I am struck with the fact that men in those days did not differ much from those of our times; but I think we may congratulate ourselves that no member would seriously think for a moment of charging a fellow-member in these frank and manly days with opposing appropriations to catch the vulgar ear.

In this particular at least, and a useful one it is, we may claim exemption from such base motives!

After these gentlemen had mutually paid the customary parliamentary courtesies to each other, each denying that the other knew anything about the subject, the committee arose.

Mr. Rutledge, in a brief appeal, brought back the House to the real question, reminding them that—

> When the man whose loss the world deplored departed from us we were all shrouded with sorrow; the mournful event awakened our deepest regret, and resolutions expressive of the national affliction at his death and commemorative of his services were unanimously passed by both Houses of Congress. Those resolutions were not carried into effect owing to a disagreement between the branches of the Legislature. Now, when we propose to carry them into effect, objections are started to every measure offered; objections that rise eternally in our horizon, which, whenever we pursue, fly from our reach, and which, always moving in a circle, we can never overtake.
> * * * * * * * * * *
> Does it become the dignity of the House thus to be occupied with trifling objections on such a subject? They had delayed too long to do what ought to have been done at once.

The question was taken on filling the blank with $200,000 and carried, which was agreed to in the House.

The bill was subsequently, January 1, 1801, engrossed, read a third time, and passed. The bill went to the Senate and was there indefinitely postponed.

For fifteen years the annals of Congress do not show that gratitude for the services of Washington had any abiding place in the hearts of the American people, and that such a man had ever lived one would doubt in perusing these pages. Except incidentally, his name is nowhere mentioned. Once in 1810, upon the death of his kinsman, Colonel William Washington, a spasm of patriotic feeling seized upon a member of the House, and he moved a resolution in honor of the deceased; but this ebullition of feeling was quickly suppressed, and, lest the contagion might spread and the memory be disturbed as to the buried monument, the resolution was rejected; and afterward, when a feeling of compunction seized upon some who had so promptly suppressed the attempt to revive any recollection of Washington, an effort was made to expunge the record so slighting to his family. It was refused, and the record kept as a warning to any who should hereafter attempt to honor the name.

In 1816 Mr. Huger, who was on the committee in 1799, moved a joint committee to inquire as to how the act of 1799 could be carried out. The Senate concurred, but no report was ever made there that I can find. The House committee reported favorably to a monument. In moving the law Mr. Huger said, his heart sank within him as he recalled to mind the scenes he had once witnessed and in which he had personally acted a part on the floor of that Congress, which represents the American nation, on the death of this great man. He had often since thought with astonishment and more than regret of the apathy of the American people on this subject. The only action taken is recorded in the following ghastly, laconic language: "And that said bill be indefinitely postponed." And so this first effort for fifteen years to redeem an early pledge died in the deadly atmosphere of indefinite postponement—that upas which grew at the touch of congressional indifference, apathy, and disloyalty to the name and fame of a man whose loss had once moved not only the American people but the whole world with profound sorrow.

In 1819 Mr. Goldsborough, in the Senate, moved a resolution to erect an equestrian statue to General Washington, which passed July 19. The House next day paid it the compliment to read it twice and send it to the Committee of the Whole, where it took refuge under the umbrageous shade of forgetfulness and died the ignoble death of postponement. The memory of Washington was allowed to repose peacefully in oblivion until 1824, when Mr. James Buchanan, just in the

*As the Annals of Congress show that Mr. Marshall made the report, a question of the authorship of these words arose in my mind. A friend, learned in patriotic lore, relieved my mind in the following letter:

DEAR SIR: I find myself confirmed in the recollection expressed to you last evening in regard to the authorship of the celebrated words, "First in war, first in peace," &c.

At page 441 of volume 2 of Marshall's Life of Washington, edition of 1839, there is this foot-note, referring to the resolution in which the words occur:

"These resolutions were prepared by General Lee, who, happening not to be in his place when the melancholy intelligence was received and first mentioned in the House, placed them in the hands of the member (Marshall) who moved them."

It was certainly honorable in Judge Marshall thus to secure to their real author the credit of these resolutions, which would otherwise have been given to himself.

House fresh from the old Keystone State, made an abortive attempt to convince Congress that by neglecting for so long a period to accomplish the object of the act of 1799 it had subjected itself to the imputation of perfidy, as well as ingratitude. He said:

> We made a solemn promise to the widowed partner of Washington and to the people of the United States by a legislative act that we would erect a monument to his memory. That distinguished lady has long slumbered with him in the grave, and this pledge has never been redeemed.

> It is difficult to determine whether this neglect be more impolitic or ungrateful. Every wise nation has paid honors to the memory of the men who have been the saviours of their country. Sculpture and painting have vied with each other in transmitting their images and the memory of their deeds to the remotest generations. By these means the holy fire of virtuous emulation has been kindled in the bosoms of the youth of succeeding ages.

Mr. Buchanan was a young member, and so far as the Annals of Congress show, he was tolerated by the House in this flight of fancy. On account of his youth and inexperience he was not reminded that the subject of his resolution had long since been consigned to oblivion and had become obsolete. If there was a member courageous enough to take him aside and congratulate him the record does not show it; but I can imagine the sardonic smile which overspread the House as the resolution of the future occupant of Washington's seat was without ceremony "ordered to lie upon the table."

I wish, Mr. Speaker, I could find somewhere along this period a bright spot; but as touching this holy duty it is all the blackness of darkness.

I would close the book of this Congress if I had not resolved to spread before you all I have found on this interesting subject.

At the same session, Mr. Johnson moved in the Senate to purchase the equestrian portrait of Washington by Rembrandt Peale, provided it should cost no more than $5,000. A similar motion was made by Mr. Buck in the House. These propositions were consigned to the table gently that they might not disturb the quiet repose of the dead soldier and sage.

About the same time the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing three busts of Washington by Capellano. The committee subsequently reported that—

> However laudable it may be in the Government to cherish a disposition friendly to the fine arts and to patronize ingenious artisans, or politic to adorn our public halls or libraries with the likenesses of departed sages and heroes, it is inexpedient to purchase these busts at this time under existing circumstances.

The brief record is that the report was concurred in.

Mr. Speaker, I challenge the civilized world, and I will include the semi-barbarous portion, to present a specimen of loftier contempt for the memories of the past, a more heartless and cavalier disposition of a sacred subject. Twenty-four years before, with one voice, the nation voted a monument to Washington, since which time no action had been taken toward it. The monument was again and again postponed; a portrait was declined, and now three little busts could not be purchased "under existing circumstances." What were the "existing circumstances," I know not, unless it be that Congress was composed of men filled with personal ambitions, men absorbed in personal success, forgetful of the past, indifferent as to the future, and who lived in an atmosphere of dead memories and unpatriotic and selfish motives.

Washington and his great services had disappeared. The question had become one of patronage of art, the embellishment of our halls and libraries, or the commemoration of our heroes and sages generally. I shall go no further for proof that the so-called golden age of the Republic was an age of sordid and mean motives no better than our own, and that the evidences of patriotic devotion to the country and to the memories of our revolutionary struggle are fourfold stronger and more sincere to-day than in the days to which we are apt to turn for high aspirations and lofty motives.

In 1826 the House tabled a resolution to adjourn over the 22d of February in honor of Washington.

In 1832 an attempt to make some arrangements to celebrate his centennial birthday was dropped owing to the refusal of Mr. John A. Washington to permit the remains to be removed from Mount Vernon.

This Congress did, however, agree to employ John Vanderlyn, of New York, to paint a full-length portrait of Washington to be placed in the Hall of Representatives opposite the portrait of Lafayette, the head to be a copy of Stuart's Washington, and $1,000 were appropriated.

This admirable painting is before you at the right of the Speaker, and I hope before we refuse to complete the unfinished monument that this picture may be veiled forever from the sight of man. I could never, Mr. Speaker, look toward your desk with those eyes full upon me and solemnly vote that our centenary may come and go without removing the national disgrace daily uttered by yonder unfinished shaft.

At the same session, also, the statue now in the East Capitol grounds, by Horatio Greenough, was ordered; the head was to be a copy of Houdon's Washington, the accessories according to the artist's judgment. This statue was designed for the Rotunda, but why it has been cast out and left utterly exposed and forsaken no one can tell.

Two unsuccessful efforts in the Senate in the same year, one to purchase Rembrandt Peale's Washington, and one to erect a full-length bronze pedestrian statue, closes the record, if we include the equestrian statue by Clark Mills, of all that has been done and refused by the American Congress toward redeeming a sacred pledge.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the history of thirty-two years of the American Congress in its effort by a suitable monumental structure to testify the gratitude of the American nation toward the Father of his Country; a man renowned throught the world, whose name is now and ever shall be the synonym for liberty and for free government.

We come now to the period when the people, despairing of congressional action, resolved to erect a monument from contributions out of their own purses. The story of this well-meant effort is soon told. Its details are fully presented in the report of the committee which gentlemen have before them.

In September, 1833, a number of patriotic citizens of Washington assembled together and on that and subsequent meetings devised a plan for erecting a national monument.

It was hoped that, a monument once erected by the voluntary contributions of the whole people, permission would be given to remove the remains of Washington for deposit in it, and whether this should be done or not it would be a rallying point for patriotism, and would be a noble emblem of attachment to the Union and its founders.

Of the original number who founded the society, not one survives. The names of these patriots should not be forgotten, and I shall do them the poor honor of connecting them with what I hope we intend to be the last and successful effort to complete what they so nobly began. They were William Brent, Daniel Brent, James Kearney, George Watterson, Joseph Gales, Joseph Gales, jr., Peter Force, William W. Seaton, John McClellan, Pishey Thompson, and Thomas Carbery.

Chief Justice Marshall was its first president and at his death Mr. Madison was chosen, since whose death the successive Presidents of the United States have held the position.

It was first determined to limit the subscription of any one person to one dollar, but this restriction was afterward removed.

In 1836 the subscriptions had reached $28,000; in 1847 they had reached $87,000.

On the 31st of January, 1848, Congress passed a resolution authorizing the society to erect the monument upon one of the reservations of the Government.

On the 4th of July, 1848, the corner-stone was laid in the presence of persons from all parts of the country and amid the prayers and plaudits of the whole people, and by 1854 the funds of the society were exhausted; the obelisk had reached the height of one hundred and seventy feet, at a cost of $230,000, since which only four feet have been added.

The society appealed to Congress for aid as subscriptions had ceased, and a committee of the House reported a bill appropriating $200,000, but at this critical juncture rival aspirants got possession of the organization, thus preventing action, and held it until the latter part of 1858, when Congress incorporated the society and confirmed its title to the reservation; but after appealing to the country in every way it could suggest, the society frankly avows its belief that if the monument is to be completed by the centennial Congress must provide the means.

This brings us face to face with our duty. The committee in recommending that Congress should promptly accept the trust tendered have not been unmindful of public sentiment as to the duty to economize expenditures in every branch of Government, but the committee thought there was that which withholdeth yet impoverisheth in this case. We did not believe that the enlightened public sentiment of the country would sustain us in refusing a reasonable appropriation to complete this monument. We felt that if no attempt had ever been made to erect a monument we could not honorably escape the duty imposed by the act of 1799, but we find here an unfinished monument started by the people which from lack of administrative machinery to reach contributors must utterly fail, unless the Representatives of the people come to their assistance, and we must either refuse or make the necessary appropriation.

Every question as to cost, stability of the shaft, and appearance when completed is answered in the report.

In brief, it is found not advisable to complete the obelisk to the height originally intended, (550 feet,) but to reduce it to the height of about 440 feet; it is found also that the pantheon or colonaded structure at the base may be dispensed with, and thus make not only a less expensive monument, but a shaft more graceful, in better proportion, and altogether more desirable.

For the pantheon is substituted a terrace with massive steps and balustrade, forming admirable pedestals for future statues.

The obelisk will cost	$245,145 17
The terrace	65,540 75
Total cost of obelisk	310,685 92

With the funds now in the hands of the society, an appropriation of $300,000 will finish the monument, and of this $75,000 will be required this year.

It is found that the work will require five hundred and thirty-seven days, so that a delay till next session is fatal.

A word, Mr. Speaker, as to the plan. I know this has been criticised, but the criticism has been based not upon the effect produced by a shapely and graceful obelisk unadorned, but by confusing this pure and simple style of Egyptian architecture with the Grecian pantheon or colonaded building surrounding its base. But this is now dispensed with according to the plan recommended by the committee, and a terrace of proper proportions substituted in its stead.

If the question were entirely a new one, and we were now for the first time to determine what character of monument should be erected to the memory of Washington, it may be that something more artistic and ornamental would be approved; but the people of the country, the rich and poor from the remotest boundaries of the Union, have subscribed to the monument upon the present design, and have expended over a quarter of a million dollars in rearing it to its present height. The committee felt that this consideration alone, admitting no others, would constrain them to adhere to this plan rather than to tear down the structure and open the question anew as to the design of a monument. It was felt that the moment this was done the whole army of empirics and charlatans in art would open their shafts upon every plan devised, and that great difficulty would result in determining upon any plan.

Some gentlemen here may remember that some years ago the committee for erecting a monument at Hamilton Square, in New York, advertised for plans, and forty or fifty were sent in and exhibited at the Art Union. Mr. Varnum tells us in his "Seat of Government" that a more grotesque and absurd group of light-houses, pyramids, and nondescript structures never were got together; one only, that of Frazee, received the faintest praise, and it was a superb copy of the Parthenon, to cost about $5,000,000.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is something in this simple, majestic obelisk to my mind eminently proper as commemorative of the character of Washington, aside from the fact that the early fathers preferred it to one more involved and composite in its design. There is something in this obelisk without ornament, pure and simple in its design, not unlike the character of Washington. Strong and enduring, it cannot be more so than his fame; lofty and majestic, it cannot be more so than the motives which governed his life; higher than any like structures in the world, it cannot excel them by so much as he stands above all others in the spotless purity of his character.

Do gentlemen object to the site? Not to speak of its location as presenting a beautiful view of the Potomac, and from the top of the monument a full view of Mount Vernon, where rest the ashes of the chief, it was selected by Washington himself as the spot for a monument to the American Revolution which in 1795 was proposed should be erected at the permanent seat of Government; and afterward it was marked on Major L'Enfant's map of Washington City as the site for the equestrian statue of General Washington ordered by the Continental Congress, which map was examined and approved by Washington himself; besides its elevation is but little below the foundations of this Capitol building.

There is another consideration, Mr. Speaker, which will address itself to the minds of some members quite as strongly as the question of honor or sentiment involved. In 1859 Congress confirmed to the monument association their title to reservation No. 3, where the monument now stands, embracing about thirty acres, which had been deeded to them by President Polk in 1848. The deed gave to this society this reservation "to use, possess, and enjoy, quietly and peaceably and free from all let or hinderance," for the purposes of the society. This reservation forms an important link in the cordon of reservations extending from the Capitol grounds to the Executive Mansion. It is worth many times in value the amount required to complete the monument. The society have expressed a willingness to reconvey this reservation to the United States if this appropriation is made and the monument completed. As a question based entirely upon business principles, and laying aside all others, this alone should impel members to vote for the appropriation.

The United States are to-day trespassers in establishing a propagating garden on one portion of this reservation. Congress cannot with honor revoke the deed made to the society and refuse to carry out the trust coupled with it.

I submit, then, to gentlemen with whom considerations of patriotism and national honor will not avail, that here is a motive worthy the most economical, and which can be defended upon business principles however exacting.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am impelled almost to apologize to the House for having even suggested such a consideration. It cannot be that patriotism and national gratitude are dead in this land. It cannot be that the name and fame of Washington are things of the past. It cannot be that we so near to him, his own countrymen, must alone refuse to do him honor.

Erskine wrote to Washington himself:

I have a large acquaintance among the most valuable and excellent classes of men; but you are the only being for whom I ever felt an awful reverence.

Said Fox of him in the British House of Commons in 1794:

Illustrious man! deriving honor less from the splendor of his situation than from the dignity of his mind. Before him all borrowed greatness sinks into insignificance, and all the potentates of Europe become little and contemptible.

Napoleon proclaimed, on hearing of the event:

Washington is dead! This great man fought against tyranny; he established the liberty of his country. His memory will be always dear to the French people, as it will be to all freemen of the two worlds.

Said Lord Brougham:

It will be the duty of the historian and the sage in all ages to let no occasion pass of commemorating this illustrious man; and until time shall be no more will a test of the progress which our race has made in wisdom and virtue be derived from the veneration paid to the immortal name of Washington.

Said Lamartine:

Efface henceforth the name of Machiavel from your titles of glory, and substitute for it the name of Washington. That is the name of modern liberty. It is no longer the name of a politician or a conqueror that is required; it is that of a man the most disinterested and most devoted to the people. This is the man required by liberty. The want of the age is a European Washington.

Is this, Mr. Speaker, a just estimate of the character of our Washington? Do we believe it? And believing it, can we turn toward yonder unfinished monument which overlooks the final resting-place of the Father of his Country, whose shadow in the evening sun reaches to the spot where we now stand, and deliberately vote to perpetuate that evidence of national dishonor and national ingratitude?

No, sir. Complete it ere your centennial day arrives, or let no American citizen look toward heaven on that glad morn and thank God that this is a land of liberty and that we are a free people. Complete it, or look not back to a noble ancestry; but confess that your nation is in its decadence, and that its days are already numbered.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Speaker, I propose to occupy a very brief period of the time of the House in the discussion of this question. The gentleman from the District, who has paid a great deal of attention to this subject, has made a very exhaustive and full speech upon it and has said all that I had intended to say and more than I could have said.

Sir, I have prepared no remarks for this occasion, and I merely rise now for the purpose of saying that I am in favor of the completion of the Washington Monument. I challenge any member of this House to say whether there has been in this House during the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses a member who has been more careful in voting for appropriations of money from the public Treasury than I have been. I have ever been careful, and have endeavored by my votes so to act that no appropriation of money should be made from the public Treasury by my consent except for measures of public importance and necessity. But I say unhesitatingly that I am ready and willing to vote the appropriation necessary to complete the Washington National Monument. I think it is a subject of regret on the part of every one who visits the national capital that the Washington Monument should remain to this day incomplete. I do not think a constituent of any member on this floor could find fault with that member if he were to vote the appropriation called for by the Select Committee on the Washington National Monument. I think, sir, that no person in all this country would find fault with any member for aiding in the completion of that monument by making an appropriation from the Treasury, because, sir, it is a well-established fact that the Washington Monument Association cannot complete the work. They have had it in hand for many years, and they confess in a communication made to the chairman of the select committee on this matter that they are willing to abandon the enterprise, admitting that they are unable to complete the work.

If the monument had never been commenced, I do not say that I would be in favor at this time of making this appropriation. If that structure which is now a standing disgrace to the American people had never been commenced, I might be willing to wait for a more propitious occasion when the revenues of the Government would better justify than now an appropriation for this purpose. But standing there as it does, carried so far toward its completion, I am unwilling that the hundredth anniversary of our existence as a nation should dawn upon us with that monument standing there as a testimony that "republics are ungrateful."

Since the first steps were taken in regard to a monument to Washington ninety-one years have passed away. In August, 1783, a resolution was passed by Congress to erect an equestrian statue to Washington. And the very site upon which this unfinished monument stands was selected for that purpose and approved by Washington himself. Washington has been dead three-quarters of a century, and yet nowhere have the American people testified their gratitude, their affection, and reverence for the name of Washington by expending any amount of money in a monumental work to perpetuate his memory. I know it has been said—it was eloquently said by the illustrious orator who spoke on the occasion of laying the corner-stone of this monument in July, 1848—that Washington needs no monument, that this wide-spread Republic is a monument to Washington. That may be all true. The immortality of Washington is assured to him. But while Washington does not need a monument, it is necessary in discharging our duty to him for us to finish this monument. I admit that Washington would be just as great if the American people should neglect to erect a monument to his name. But in justice to ourselves, in justice to the character of the man, we cannot further neglect to finish the structure which was commenced here in sight of this Capitol. The duty is incumbent upon us, although Washington may not need it.

There are some questions connected with the building of this monument upon which this House probably may desire to be satisfied before it will be willing to vote this appropriation of money. There are two practical questions which presented themselves with great force to your committee. I think that committee has given proper attention to the two objections which have been presented to completing this monument which has been commenced here. The first was that the foundation of the present structure was so unsafe that it would be unwise to hazard any further expenditure of money upon it. The committee called upon General Humphreys of the Engineer Department to examine the foundation and the bases of the present work, and ascertain if it would be safe to carry it to completion according to the original plan.

General Humphreys detailed Lieutenant Marshall, of the Engineer Corps, to make the examination, a young man who I think I can safely say has no superior in this country as an engineer. He made the examination and submitted a full and exhaustive report upon the condition of the present structure. He reports that the foundation is safe; and while he thinks it might not be entirely safe to carry the monument up according to the original plan, to the height of six hundred feet, still it would be perfectly safe to carry it up to the height proposed by the committee, that is four hundred and thirty-seven feet. He says he has no doubt that it would be safe to carry the monument up to that height. That was an important question for us to consider, because it has been alleged by many parties who visited that monument that the chipping off in the lines of the lower courses was an indication that it would be unsafe to carry the structure up farther.

Lieutenant Marshall explains how that took place. He says that the outer edges of the blocks which composed the lowet courses bein thicker than the inner edges, and the courses having been laid too close together, the chipping off is caused by the pressure of the shaft upon those lower courses, and indicates nothing but the fact that the outer edges had been laid too close together. That it affects at all the safety and the stability of the structure he says is not the fact.

He sunk a shaft along the line of the foundation for the purpose of examining the character of the soil underlying it. He gives us a detailed account of the soil and the foundation upon which the monument rests. While he thinks the height of six hundred feet would probably be unsafe, although he does not say it would be, yet being very careful in his examinations, estimates, and calculations, he declares positively that it would be perfectly safe to carry the structure up to four hundred and thirty-seven feet, which the committee think would be high enough.

If the structure is limited to that height the sum required for its completion would be moderate; only about $310,000 being required to complete the shaft and the terrace which Lieutenant Marshall has recommended for the ornamentation around the base of the monument. This plan dispenses with the elaborate work included in the extensive pantheon which was a part of the original plan. That pantheon is to be omitted and a small plain obelisk, an unornamented shaft four hundred and thirty-seven feet high with a terrace about the base, is to be adopted in its stead, and according to his calculations that would require an expenditure of $310,000.

Can it be said that the American people will be unwilling to expend that small sum for the purpose of completing this monument? I do not think they will be unwilling to do so. I think that this House, nearly one hundred members of it having been willing to vote the sum of $3,000,000 for the purpose of a centennial celebration at Philadelphia, would also be willing to vote the sum of $310,000 for the completion of this monument, or about one-tenth of the same they were willing to give to the centennial celebration.

We have then, Mr. Speaker, a safe basis upon which to work, which unfortunately has not been the case with former efforts made in Congress for the completion of this monument. I think this is one of the reasons why Congress has been so negligent with regard to making an appropriation for it. We have never had heretofore a full report and clear statement of the exact condition of the monument. There has been abroad in the public mind an impression that there was something unsafe about the present structure and that it would not be advisable to carry it to completion. That question I think is now settled by indubitable authority based upon a full and searching examination, which has resulted in establishing the safety and stability of the present structure and the feasibility of carrying it to the height of four hundred and thirty-seven feet. This I think is established beyond all doubt.

Such being the case, it only remains for us to vote this appropriation. As I have said, $310,000 will be the utmost amount needed for the completion of the work. The question has been asked of me whether all this would be required in one year. It would not. If $75,000 were appropriated this year and the remaining portion next year it would be sufficient.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman will allow me to say that I consulted Lieutenant Marshall, the engineer whose report is before us, with direct reference to ascertaining the least sum that it would be necessary to expend before the reassembling of Congress in December next, and he said that with the amount which the society now has—about $15,000—all that would be needed between this time and the assembling of Congress would be $75,000 additional.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Marshall, the engineer who made the examination of the present structure, has not only made the estimate of the amount of appropriation which would be required, but he tells us the time within which it can be completed; that it would take five hundred and thirty-seven working days to complete the shaft. This estimate is based of course upon the consideration of the number of men who can be advantageously employed upon the work for that period of time; because only a limited number can work to advantage. It would require, according to his estimate, five hundred and thirty-seven working days. It must be plain, then, to the House that if the work is to be completed by the 4th of July, 1876, it must be commenced very soon, as there will be only about six hundred working days between the next 4th of July and the 4th of July, 1876. The work therefore must be commenced soon after the coming 4th of July. The appropriation proposed would not of course all be needed at once. If we make an appropriation of $75,000 this year and the balance next year it would be amply sufficient to carry the work to completion by the 4th of July, 1876.

As to the association that has had charge of this work I must say that a more patriotic body of men never labored for a good cause than the men who have worked for the completion of this monument. I know that much scandal has been in circulation with regard to the management of this affair, but if gentlemen knew the character of the men who have had this work in charge for many years—the officers of this association—they must at once acquit them of any such conduct as is attributed to them by the false rumors which have been afloat in regard to the management of this enterprise. They have labored hard and faithfully to complete it; but the fact has been shown, and they admit it, that by the system of voluntary contribution this monument cannot be finished. The only fair way is to give every person in the Republic a chance to contribute by taxation to the erection of this monument. I think the American people should build it, and the only fair way to distribute the expense is by an appropriation from the public Treasury, so that every person may contribute his share.

Mr. Speaker, upon Washington more eulogies have been pronounced than upon any man who lived in the eighteenth century. He has been praised by statesmen, by historians, and by poets both of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. I think it can be truly said that the memory of Washington has not faded from the American mind. I believe that the American people do yet appreciate the life, character, and services of Washington. I cannot believe that the American people are so derelict in their duty to his memory that they are willing now in this national capital that monument shall longer stand incomplete. In this beautiful capital, built upon the spot selected by Washington, we have erected stately public buildings for carrying on the business of the various Departments of the Government—buildings substantial in structure and beautiful in their architecture. This city has been wonderfully improved within the last few years. Its parks have been ornamented, its streets have been beautified. But we are constantly admonished of our neglect in seeing this shaft incomplete. Speaking for myself and my constituents, I say I am unwilling that unfinished shaft shall stand any longer as a reproach to us. Early in the Forty-second Congress I introduced a resolution calling for information concerning this enterprise. I did not know at the time that that information had been called for in a prior Congress and was already at hand. But I have labored ever since I have been in Congress, in an humble way at least, to bring about among my friends a state of feeling which would aid us in the completion of this monument; and nothing would gratify me more when I retire from this Congress than to know that I may have done something in urging the completion of this work.

All civilized nations have honored their illustrious men by works of monumental art. Greece had a monument or statue of some kind for every god and every hero. Her public buildings, her groves and fountains, abounded in works of the highest art, commemorative of illustrious deeds and noble characters. But we have neglected the memory of the greatest uninspired man that has ever lived. Whether this neglect is to be persisted in rests now with Congress.

THE INJUSTICE OF MONOPOLY.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a bill early in this session for the purpose of permitting the growers of tobacco to sell the same in the markets freely and unrestrained as their wheat, corn, oats, or other produce. I am glad that the Committee on Ways and Means have agreed to give partial relief in respect to the crop of tobacco, but it does not go far enough yet. As this bill naturally brings in review the whole system of currency and revenue, I propose to discuss at some length these questions in this connection. Why is it that the farmer cannot sell his tobacco crop in the same manner as his other produce? Is it because that, like cotton, another article that has come under the taxing displeasure of Congress, it is the product of a section of the country which seems to be considered here as the special carcass upon which the tax-gathering vultures shall feed? These products, tobacco and cotton, above all others, extort from the vaults of Europe and eastern countries that gold so necessary to the success of the schemes of our modern apostles of specie currency.

Mr. Speaker, the farmer who takes his wheat, oats, corn, pork, and other commodities to market finds for them an open competing one. Every dealer has an unrestricted right to bid upon them, thus securing to the seller competition, and consequently the highest market price. Not so with his tobacco; none but the select few who are able to pay a license therefor dare touch this article. It is evident that this gives a monopoly. The license gentleman has it all his own way. He offers his price; the producer must accept it or let his crop rot; for there is no one else to buy. This is particularly true with the poor man, who is unable to produce a sufficient quantity to pay him to go to the expense of preparing it for shipment to a competing market.

Visit your tax upon the manufactured article if it must be taxed, but do not cripple this industry by withholding freedom of sale. I know of my own knowledge the great injustice this law inflicts. Many poor men in my district tell me they could raise tobacco and do better with it than any other product, but they are not able to grow it in large quantities, and are necessarily confined to the local trading points for the sale of the crop. This market is monopolized by about one man, who can afford to pay a license. This gives him an absolute monopoly, and he is enabled to say to the producers, I will pay you so much for your tobacco; you can take my price or take it home; but with his wheat and all other products the farmer can take his price or go to the next merchant for a better bargain.

Now, I have undertaken, in a very precise way, without any circumlocution, to show this injustice. The people are growing weary of all monopolies; especially do they condemn a policy that by any system of revenue monopoly prevents a free and unrestrained sale of the products of the soil. I appeal to the Representatives of the great North and West to assist in doing away with this injustice to their colaborers of the tobacco-growing States. You would not for a moment submit to such an injustice as a law prohibiting a free sale and exchange of your cereals and other produce. Hence it is your interest to throttle at the threshold this attempt to levy a tax on the sale of produce. This is a precedent that could be called into argument to tax the sale of your cereals. Indeed, the one would be as just as the other. You have your organizations of farmers for mutual protection against all systems of monopolies. So have the farmers in the tobacco-growing districts. Your aims and theirs are the same. You are bound together by the ties of interest and common sympathies in your vocations. Then I have a right, as the Representative of a people who are quite extensively engaged in the production of tobacco, to ask of you to give your votes here in relief of the farmers of my district.

We of the tobacco-growing States have worked hard and voted at all times in the interest of the grain-producing sections, and we ought in return to have the assistance of that interest here and now on this floor. I can tell my republican friends that they must change their legislation. The whole policy of the republican party seems to be aimed at a system of oppression of the agricultural classes. You have a tariff law professedly for the purpose of raising the revenues of the Government; but in reality these laws work to the benefit of monopolies and in favor of manufacturers as against the producer and consumer.

Why is it that all the taxes of the Government fall directly on the producing classes? I can easily see the reason of this state of things. This Government in its revenue and financial policy has for the last fourteen years been conducted in the interest of monopoly and bondholders as against the producers of wealth. The Eastern States have stood by the republican party through good and evil report, because in turn the republican party in power has wielded all its influence in the legislation of the Government in the interest of these States, while the West and South are turned over to the tender mercies of the monopolies of the country.

This gross injustice and inequality cannot long exist. The people long oppressed, yet patient and submissive, are organizing for war on monopolies; a war that will end with the smoke of a political battle curling above these mountains of oppression, leaving your monopoly power defeated, a mangled and bleeding corpse. You had better begin right here and now to reform the legislation of Congress in the interest of the people. They are suffering on account of a policy of contracting the currency, thus rendering it impossible for debtors to meet their liabilities. You have further oppressed them by refusing a few days ago the payment of duties on imports one-half in legal tenders and bank-notes as proposed by the democrats in this House. This would have reduced the tariff and added to the value of your currency.

Why is it that you require the duties on imports paid in gold? It is because you desire to make your tariff oppressive and in the interest of monopoly. Why is it you refuse to receive paper money for the payment of the bondholder? It is because monopoly of wealth by political favorites and inside speculators has been the policy and practice of the powers that be. So long as money was abundant and "times easy" the people paid but little attention to politics and less to the imperious legislation that was daily occurring here. Money gamblers and speculators of all sorts at this time were plotting and laying their schemes for public plunder. All that was necessary to their success was to give a few loyal whoops and bound with yells of patriotism into the republican camp. They were eagerly taken into fellowship and tenderly cared for.

I shall not be understood as casting any reflection upon the great mass of patriotic unionists of both political parties, who were patriotic for patriotism's sake and who were unionists for the love of our common country. Far be that from my object. But I desire to pay my kind regards to those "gilt-edge" gentlemen who were and are republicans to-day for no other purpose than to prostitute the patriotic fervor of the masses of that party to the base use of lining their own pockets.

To show what use these intriguers have made of the republican party in the name of loyalty and patriotism, I shall give a few figures and facts that are not generally known and considered by the people, but which they will know, and when they are made fully aware of the enormity of the appalling swindle they will, with curses loud and deep, bury forever a party that could be so false to every principle of honesty and fair dealing. The Treasury statistics show these facts: on the 31st day of August, 1865, we had $2,193,395,627 of currency; in round numbers, say, $2,000,000,000. On the 1st of December last we had only $631,488,677, showing a reduction of $1,560,906,851 in eight years. This was an annual reduction of over one hundred and ninety millions. Of course in 1865 money was easy, for the national debt at that time was for the most part owned and held by the people themselves, in the nature of Government promises to pay used as currency.

But as this reduction or contraction of the country progressed times began to get harder. Year by year the people felt that money, once plentiful, was becoming scarcer and more difficult to procure. This they knew, but they did not generally understand the reason of it. Thus matters progressed till the tension last fall cut the gordian knot and let loose upon the country a financial panic that startled and paralyzed the whole country. The currency had been contracted till the people were brought up with such a short turn that they found themselves standing on their heads, with empty pockets and debts unpaid. This severe somersault has set them all adrift; they are studying now the situation; they know not what is to come next; but in their extremity they are counseling together to see what the matter is. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, they propose to know "just what's the matter," and when they do know there will be such a "shaking of dry bones" in the republican camp and especially among the favored few, the "gilt-edged," as compared to which the financial panic was a mere bagatelle.

Laying aside all partisan prejudice, I have honestly endeavored to ascertain for myself, in order to lay before the people I have the honor to represent, what I conceive to be the cause of this panic as well as the cause of the extreme poverty of that people. To me it is a question of no difficulty at all. I think when we come to trace up the one and a half billions of money, mostly a non-interest-bearing debt, held by the people themselves as a circulating medium, and find, as the records of the Treasury Department show, that this amount has been converted into bonds bearing interest and exempt from taxation, we will find ourselves on the right track. Let us review the figures and facts. For illustration, in 1865 over two billions of currency in circulation. Now, sir, political economy and common sense teach us that in proportion to the amount of money in circulation is the value of all property increased. This is too plain for argument. The scarcity of money is always effectually urged by the buyer as a reason for a reduction of price on the part of the seller; besides, the debtor whose debts are pressing hard upon him is always at the mercy of the shylocks when money is scarce.

When we had over two billions of currency the farmer had no trouble in selling his lands, his horses, cattle, and cereals. He always found a ready market at good figures. Every farmer knows that he cannot now sell his lands or his cattle and produce for one-half what he could in 1865. I shall tell him very plainly the reason of this. Indeed he doubtless now knows it from what has been before stated. But to make the matter plain I shall refer again to the figures. We now have in circulation, say in round numbers seven hundred millions, which is a little more than the actual amount. This is about one-third the amount in circulation in 1865. According to the theory before stated property has depreciated two-thirds in value since 1865. This for exceptional reasons may not be true in all cases, but on a general average it will not fall far short of the fact. It is true that by the productive energies of the country in the way of improvements and other modes of labor the taxable wealth of the country may be as great now as ten years ago.

But the real question is how do the prices of commodities the products of the soil compare now with prices in 1865? This I will leave for the producer himself to answer, and I am quite sure he will concur with me in saying that they have been decreasing as steadily as the currency has been contracted. With all the labor and improvements he has been able to put on his farm in these eight years, can he sell it now for what he could in 1865? To this he will also concur in saying "no." Now, Mr. Speaker, by the absorption of the currency we have in a few short years decreased property values over one-half. We have not, however, decreased the taxes of the people, but on the contrary we have added to their taxes by converting a non-interest bearing debt into an interest-bearing one. Thus has the free currency of the people been swallowed up by the funding process of the Government, their property values sunken more than one-half, and their taxes increased to meet the interest on this funded debt.

But this is not all; the interest to pay this debt is one hundred and twenty millions annually, payable in gold coin. You not only took from the people their currency but you bonded it, and made the interest payable in gold, thus saddling them with a tax of $120,000,000 gold per annum. Is this all? O, no; not half. How is this gold procured? It is, as we all know, by tariffs on imports. You passed an act to absorb the people's money into a bonded debt, and provided in that act that the imports of the country should be taxed in gold to pay the interest on this debt. In other words, the currency used and owned by the people was taken from them and converted into a debt bearing a gold interest, and pledged as a fund to pay that interest the duties on imports. Was this right? Why did you not pledge the wealth of the nation to redeem in gold this legal currency while in the hands of the people? The one hundred and twenty millions of gold now collected annually simply to meet interest would have paid off your legal-tenders and ultimately redeemed them, thus giving the whole people the opportunity to share the benefits of the redemption besides preventing such an undue contraction of the currency. Instead of that you have for the last eight years been paying interest on a public debt that before then for the most part drew no interest at all, but was a convenient currency for the people. At the rate of one hundred and twenty millions per annum now collected and applied to this interest account, had it been applied to the redemption of the outstanding paper currency, our national debt would have been nearly half paid off by this time.

Besides, the fact that this currency was being thus gradually redeemed in gold would by this time have placed it nearly on par with gold. I am fully satisfied that had the policy of setting apart $100,000,000 annually for the redemption of this paper currency that we would now be nearer, far nearer a specie basis than we are, and besides, we would have been all this time paying the principal instead of the interest on our national debt. This seems so true, so just and simple, the question may well be asked, why was it not done? It was not done because there was not sufficient political wisdom and foresight in the republican party to see the propriety of this policy. It is because that party was ruled by interested and designing men. A deep scheme was laid to plunder an unsuspecting people.

The first process of plundering was in the interest of a shoddy aristocracy who had accumulated a large amount of these legal-tenders and other currency by swindling the Government and the soldiers during the war, in furnishing the Army with rotten goods and spoiled food. They, with other speculators, besieged the Congress of the United States to convert their promises to pay into bonds bearing gold interest, first as a matter of impudent favoritism for their pretended loyalty, and secondly, to prevent, as they claimed, any ultimate attempts of repudiation.

In order to carry out this piece of political rascality, combinations had to be made and were unfortunately too easily effected. The Eastern States were in need of high tariffs. Protective tariffs were necessary to the prosperity that had attended their monopolies of furnishing the manufactured supplies of the country during the war when imports were almost impossible. The way to do this was to lay such a tariff on imports as to continue this monopoly. The way to fasten effectually and permanently upon the country the necessity for this was to fund these greenbacks and other currency and pledge the Government to levy duties on imports sufficient to pay the interest instead of principal on this funded debt. Thus we see a combination easily made. This scheme all put money in the pockets of the East, for they had accumulated the greenbacks to be funded and it was they who so much stood in need of this tariff.

The legislation was easily effected, for the republican party ruled the country; and New England with her experienced, long-trained, and well-drilled Congressmen ruled the republican party. The majority of the republican party, that is the great masses, believed that party to be honest. They have trusted it too long. We cannot blame our eastern brethren for perpetrating this enormous injustice upon the producing sections. We ought to have aroused long ago to the true danger. The people are now thoroughly in earnest, and seem determined to hurt somebody. The sooner they strike at this party of corruption and high-handed oppression the better. We cannot expect the people to remedy all these evils. They can now at least show their detestation of a party that has betrayed them so flagrantly. It ought to have satisfied those financial schemers when they had converted the money of the people into a permanent interest-bearing debt in order to create the necessity of high tariffs for the payment of the interest.

But did they stop here? O, no, Mr. Speaker; after doing this they went still further in their robbery and plunder. They were at first afraid to issue bonds calling for payment in specie, and made the interest only so payable. But so soon as the funding process had swallowed up the greater part of the legal-tenders and the bonds had been bought up and concentrated in the grasp of monopoly, it was demanded by these "gilt-edge" gentlemen that the bonds themselves should be paid in gold. What did the republican party do with this further scheme of oppression? Well, in 1869, they passed an act as follows:

An act to strengthen the public credit of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all its obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the law, by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States, and of all the interest-bearing obligations, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money, or in other currency than gold and silver, but none of the said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such times as the United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

This act was an attempt to forestall specie payment in favor of the bondholder. It was totally unnecessary, because the bonds had long been issued. They were in the hands of private holders. Had the Government issued the bonds and placed them in the market for sale it might have been policy to have thus pledged the national faith for their payment in gold, in order that the bonds might be strengthened in the market so as to yield to the Government the highest figure for them. But nothing of this kind was in view, for the bonds had long been issued in lieu of greenbacks surrendered or paid for them. They had been transferred over and over again at prices regulated by the known fact that they were legally and morally payable in legal-tenders.

The only effect this act had or was ever intended to have was to put millions of dollars in the pockets of these bondholders by thus appreciating their securities. By this one infamous enactment the people have been swindled out of hundreds of millions. The theory now is that this act pledges the good faith and honor of the nation to pay these bondholders to the last farthing in gold for what they purchased in greenbacks.

The act speaks for itself. It purports to settle the question as to whether these bonds are to be paid in coin. How does the act settle this question? It settles it by stating that all obligations of the Government not expressly provided to be paid in lawful money (namely, legal-tenders) shall be paid in coin. Thus in the interest of the bondholder a republican Congress pledges the faith of the Government for the payment in coin of debts that did not bear upon their face any such contract. Nor did the act authorizing the issue of these bonds require them to be paid in coin. The legal-tenders bear upon their face the declaration that they are a legal tender for all debts public and private except duties on imports and interest on the public debt. These notes were issued prior to the bonds. The bonds did not either in the acts authorizing their issue or on their face call for gold payment. They clearly come under that public debt mentioned for which the greenbacks were a legal tender. Only imports and interest on public debt were excepted. Expressio unius est exclusio altrius is the familiar legal maxim. The expressing or exempting imports and interest on public debt necessarily excluded everything else.

Why did the Congress of the United States undertake to make these bonds payable in gold, and thus settle the question in favor of the bondholders as against the people? Had there really been any doubt as to how they were payable, why did they not permit the courts of law to decide the matter without this hasty interference? It was because the bondholders knew, Congress knew, and everybody knew, that these bonds were payable in legal-tenders, and this piece of legalized robbery was perpetrated in order to gain the support of the money-power of the country. The act was passed not for the purpose of interpreting or defining the law, but to make that law which was not law before. A more barefaced swindle was never in the annals of history perpetrated upon a free people. This act is the slogan with which the President crushed the currency bill of this session in his veto message. He claims that to increase the paper issues now is a violation of the nation's faith as pledged in this act.

The passage of this act was a fraud upon the people. These legal-tenders are now and ever have been a terror to the bond holder. As long as there is one of them in existence he imagines he is not safe. He fears that an outraged people will yet discover that these paper issues are a legal tender for all debts, public and private, and will ultimately be used to pay his bonds. This is the true secret of the howl raised by the "gilt-edged" when any attempt at increasing the currency is made. It would have been far better for them, may be, had the President signed the currency bill. This would have allayed all excitement, given a partial relief to the people, and thus more effectually secured acquiescence in the payment of these bonds in gold. But now the whole question is thrown open for discussion and revision.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time we were seeking modes of relief for an oppressed people. True statesmanship dictates that course at all times. But when mutterings of discontent begin to darken into ominous clouds, threatening the country with a hurricane of popular discontent, we should heed it. I assure you if the republican party does not heed it, the people will utterly crush you.

Now, sir, I propose very briefly to allude to another monopoly created by this party that smells very taintedly in the nostrils of the people. You have a monopoly in the banking law that, like all your other acts, has worked to the benefit of the East as against the West and South. These favored States have received at your hands by this monopoly eighty millions of currency more than there pro rata share. You took from the people their free currency, their greenbacks, and converted them into bonds bearing a gold interest, and in order to partially supply the currency thus wrongfully taken, you authorize these banking institutions to deposit their bonds, for which you give them the currency that should be free, and thus allow the banks of the country to monopolize the money of the people and deal it out to them in broken doses at exorbitant rates of interest. You compel the people not only to pay interest to these banks for this currency, but also to pay interest in gold on the bonds deposited by the banks as security for the currency you give them. The modus operandi is this: A corporation desires to go into the business of banking. For that purpose the company borrows $90,000 from the Government, namely, the people, by depositing $100,000 in Government bonds. These bonds draw interest in gold, while thus on deposit, yet the Government loans $90,000 to the bank without interest. The people in order to get this currency are bound to pay just such interest as these banks may in their kindness exact. The people are the Government. Well, then, the people loan these banks $90,000. On depositing $100,000 worth of bonds for the high privilege of loaning $90,000 without interest, the people pay the interest on $100,000 deposited as collateral security for the $90,000 loaned.

Mr. Speaker, how would you like to loan me $10,000 for which I should deposit as security a good note drawing 5 per cent. interest, and require of you to pay me the interest on this note, and yet I am not required to pay you but 1 per cent. on what you have loaned me. How long would it take to make me rich and you quite poor in such financial exploits? Yet this is precisely the financial system on which these banks are run and supported by this Administration. It is just such ledgerdemain as this in the whole financial policy of this administration, both as to the currency and taxation for revenue, that is day by day making the rich States and rich individuals richer and the poor ones poorer. The people have borne with this rank injustice as long as it is possible for them to bear, and I predict that the day of reckoning is close at hand.

But we are not yet done with this bank job. It is not all told yet. Let us see. The people—for they are the Government, or used to be—loan a bank $90,000 of currency; for that the bank as collateral deposits with the people a bond for $100,000 bearing 5 per cent. interest in gold. It would appear but just that this interest should cease while the bonds were held as security for money loaned, but not so; the people absolutely give to these banks $90,000 in currency for almost no consideration, for the bank exacts interest on the bonds deposited and pays only 1 per cent. for the currency loaned. Now it is true that we the people have given the banks this currency, but how are we to be benefited in the transaction? We cannot get a dollar of this currency which we absolutely give the banks without first mortgaging our estates as security and pay from 10 to 20 per cent. interest thereon.

The people by this Administration are thus compelled to turn over without consideration to these banks the people's own money, thus giving to them an absolute monopoly of the currency of the country. The people in order to get their money back, thus given the banks, and put it in circulation to pay their debts and daily expenses, are compelled to mortgage all they have and pay, as before remarked, from 10 to 20 per cent. therefor. Here we have it. The bank gets, first, its 5 per cent. gold interest on bonds, which are exempt from taxation recollect; and, secondly, just so much as it may see proper to exact from a hard-pressed and poverty-stricken people as interest for loans. This money monopoly is grinding and gnawing at the vitals of the country. The people, crushed beneath this enormity, may squirm and gripe and writhe in abject poverty and helplessness, yet to relieve them to the amount of one cent by issuing greenbacks, the free money of the country, would in the hard-fisted, hard-hearted, money gripes of the President be a violation of the national faith, pledged in the sweet-scented act of 1869 before quoted.

Mr. Speaker, you and I and the whole country know that the President will not sign a currency bill that does not provide for further funding the free money, the greenbacks, and placing the country still further at the mercy of these banks. You have been trying to effect a compromise currency bill based on that theory in order to claim before the people that the President has signed a bill that will give satisfaction, so as to tide over the fall elections. But I predict your failure. I do not think there is a democrat in this House that will consent to take away from the people their greenbacks by any further process of funding them into gold interest-bearing debt. But they will, I am quite certain, assist you to so remodel the whole financial system as to do away with these banks entirely and substitute the greenback currency, and thus demolish one of the most grinding monopolies of the age.

I have no hostility to gentlemen engaged in the banking interest. It is not their fault, but rather their good fortune. The blame is with the Government. It is the fault of Congress in placing the finances of the country in the keeping of monopoly. Were banking free it would be relieved of many objections, but not all by any means.

Mr. Speaker, in considering the tariff bill, by which the revenues are provided to meet the enormous expenses of this Government, and in review of it, we have been compelled to allude somewhat at length to the whole revenue and financial policy of the party in power. We find it reeking with corrupt jobs, cunningly devised in the interest of monopolies, and full of inequalities and gross injustice toward the producing classes and sections.

Mr. Speaker, there is just one way to keep the public faith. If it be true that the public faith is pledged to the redemption of the national debt in gold, we must, to secure that result, foster those interests that bring the gold to our shores. We must turn our attention and fostering care to that part of our people heretofore so much neglected. No; I shall not say neglected, for you have never forgotten them when you needed revenues to fill the depleted coffers of the Treasury. I allude to the producing sections. It is our surplus produce exported that brings the gold to us to pay these debts. Instead of crippling and hampering these industries, we should encourage them by relieving the tobacco and grape interests by the amendment I have proposed to this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I submit a table showing the amount of exports for 1872-'73:

Export of agricultural products in 1872-'73.

Animals	$92,033,447
Ashes and bark	103,215
Bread and breadstuffs	98,743,151
Raw cotton	227,243,069
Fruits	1,783,305
Raw hides	3,605,023
Hops	272,403
Naval stores—rosin, tar, and pitch	3,809,421
Oil-cake	3,611,562
Provisions—beef, pork, lard, &c.	78,823,262
Seeds	1,160,329
Tallow	7,068,471
Tobacco	25,331,946
Total	453,588,604

This shows the exports from the agricultural States to be $453,588,604. It will be noted that one-half of this amount was in cotton, and that tobacco stands fourth in the list. The exports of manufactures for the same period all told was only $61,307,125, very little more than double that of the tobacco crop alone. Should we not give every encouragement to the sections of our country that bring to us the gold of foreign countries by these exports?

I propose recapitulating some of the grievances of this people.

First. You have by an unexampled contraction of the currency reduced the value of the agriculturist's lands and produce one-half in the last eight years.

Secondly. To pay the interest on the funded debt, the cause of this contraction, you have placed your tariffs so high that there has been no corresponding decrease in all the articles the farmer has to buy; thus reducing the price of all he has to sell but maintaining at highest figures what he buys.

But this is not the worst feature of your policy by any means. By this funding and contracting process you have in eight years reduced the currency from over one and a half billion dollars to less now than six hundred and fifty millions, a reduction of nearly two-thirds, swallowed up in an untaxable, interest-bearing debt, thus almost absolutely depriving him of the money with which to meet the debts contracted. While you have reduced in value all on earth he produces at least one-half, you have not reduced his debts one cent, but left them as high mountains looming up to terrify him in his pathway with scarcely a single ray of currency to light up the dark heights. His lands have come down, his cattle and produce have come down, his currency taken away, but his mortgages and debts of all kinds remain standing according to the amount of the contract. They do not come down, but rise higher and higher in proportion to his inability to pay his debts. What he has to buy and his taxes are as high now as ever, but all that he has to sell and the money he had once to pay has been reduced over one-half. Here is poverty and distress for you that would seem beyond all hope.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is hope; we are yet a free people, in some respects at least. The ballot-box remains; in that lies the people's hope. Monopolies are odious, discriminating laws are detestable. These evils the republican party has created and upheld. That party must first fall; there will go with it in the same grove all these monopolies and unjust legislation.

WASHINGTON NATIONAL MONUMENT.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I hope in anything that I shall say to-night I shall not say that which I shall hereafter have any cause under any circumstances to regret. When the next gentleman who shall take the interest in the completion of this monument which is taken by the gentleman who is the Delegate from this District shall search through the records of the past some time during the next century if this monument is not then completed, to find what has been done during this Congress in reference to its completion, I hope if it appears that I took any part in it there will be nothing I say that will lead any to think or justify them in thinking that I fail to appreciate to its fullest extent the grand work, the great achievements, and the noble needs of him whom it has been sought to commemorate by the erection of the monument about which this discussion has been had.

It is a very ungrateful and unpleasant task to say anything which may seem to obstruct legislation of this kind, and it is only from a sense of high duty that I have consented in my own mind to do it at all. It is because I am a member of the committee and have such feelings as these that I seek an opportunity at this time to say a few words explanatory of the course I shall pursue.

It is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, that this monument was located where it is. The unscientific mind does not believe what it appears some scientific gentlemen have reported in reference to it, that it is located in a proper place. The average man thinks it located in a very bad place. I know that these scientific surveys disclose what is claimed to be the fact, that it is high ground there. It does not seem so to one coming into this city. It is unfortunate that this particular plan was adopted. I do not know but it was the best at the time that could be thought of. I will not undertake to set my judgment up against it now, and I do not know but it is a good plan. Yet it is unfortunate for the completion of the work that the people do not think so. I have heard many make observations in reference to that monument. I have listened to the eloquent and energetic gentleman who has the management of this matter with great pleasure speaking in laudation of it, but I have never had any gentleman speak to me on the streets with regard to it who did not regret that such a shaft as that was ever started to be erected, who did not think in its conception, in its plan, in its whole design, it did not seem to be a proper thing for the American people to attempt to erect. And that is one of the misfortunes in the way of the construction of this monument. It does not appear either, Mr. Speaker, that it is carrying out the resolutions of former Congresses, to which we have had our attention called in so earnest and eloquent terms by the Delegate from the District. On the contrary, as shown to-night, by the proceedings of early Congresses they resolved in favor of some kind of statue, an equestrian statue. They resolved from time to time in favor of some kind of monument. But I do not know that Congress has ever resolved in favor of that shaft. I have never been able to find it, and I think if such a resolution had been in existence the Delegate from the District would have referred to it. I have examined the matter with some care and have not found such resolution. I do not think the gentleman is in favor of it himself. Independent of some other questions, to which I will come pretty soon, it has an unfortunate foundation as it stands.

Then, Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate again that the surveys and examinations which have been made with reference to the stability of the present structure are not satisfactory at least to me, and I know they are not satisfactory to many others. It has been asserted that it is safe to erect that monument to the height that it is proposed now to be erected upon its present foundation. It may seem very strange for one who makes no pretension to technical knowledge or information upon such a subject as that to say that he does not think it is safe. I have examined with care the report of the gentleman who has surveyed it. I believe he is a skilled and excellent officer. I believe that Lieutenant Marshall has a bright future before him; but I am not entirely satisfied with the testimony which he gives on this subject. I am going to read from his report a few extracts, for the purpose of showing to the gentlemen interested and to the House one of the reasons why I cannot vote for this appropriation. He says in his report many things, but does not appear to give an affirmative answer to the question, whether it is safe to erect the monument upon the foundation as at present laid.

I do not think he says so, Mr. Speaker, and I will read what he does say; and first, in speaking of the condition of the shaft at present, from the examination he made of it, he says:

This examination resulted in showing that the axis of the shaft is inclined so that its top is deflected 1.4 inches to the northwest. In February last the upper of the oundation courses was found by leveling to be depressed .6 of an inch to the northwest, which would indicate a deflection at the top of the axis of that portion of the shaft now completed of about 1.6 inches.

I do not claim that that shows a very dilapidated condition of the monument; but I want to read the balance of what he says about it. That is in reference to a shaft one hundred and seventy feet high, and now it is proposed to raise it up to—how much?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Four hundred and thirty-seven feet.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. He says in another portion of the report:

That portion now built consists of its foundation masonry of rough blocks of gniess, many of them small, laid in hydraulic mortar—twenty-five feet high, eighty feet square at base, and fifty-nine feet square at top, and a portion of the shaft one hundred and seventy feet high of marble ashlar facing and rubble backing.

Excavations and examinations show that the foundation is placed eight feet below the surface of the ground upon ordinary loam or a mixture of clay and fine sand. Below this the proportion of sand was found to increase until a depth of twenty-two feet, or fourteen feet below the bottom of the foundation was attained, when a compact bed of gravel cemented by a ferruginous clay was found, which is inclined under such a small angle that it may be regarded as sensibly horizontal. The difficulty in boring in such material, and the presence of water making the sinking of an ordinary well more expensive than the means at my disposal would allow, no examination as to the thickness of this stratum of gravel or hard-pan was made. Sufficient is known, however, from wells dug in the monument lot to justify the assertion that there is no reason for apprehending that the earth is not firm for a sufficient depth to afford a good foundation for the heaviest of structures, provided sufficient spread be given to the foundation and proper measures be taken to insure a uniform distribution of pressure.

Now if that is a square answer to the proposition submitted to him, if it is an answer that such a shaft could be safely erected upon the foundation, I for one do not consider it so, and it is not satisfactory to me. That is another reason why I care not to vote an appropriation to construct this monument. The most direct answer he makes as to whether it would be safe to construct the monument on its present foundation is found in this language:

As far as can be discovered in a careful examination of the structure, there are no sufficient grounds for doubting the security of the foundation under its present load.

He says as far as can be discovered on a careful examination of the structure there are no sufficient grounds for doubting the security of the foundation under its present load; but you propose to add two hundred feet to this monument. In the other place where he answers the question he says it is sufficiently firm to support the heaviest structure provided a spread is given to secure it. That is the only language in which he refers to the sufficiency of the foundations, and if the gentleman can draw from that an affirmative statement, that it is perfectly safe to erect this particular monument to the height to which it is proposed to erect it, then he is more capable of determining the meaning of words than I am. I confess I am unable to do it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I know the gentleman desires the truth in this matter. While he disagrees with a majority of the committee, I am confident that he disagrees with them honestly, and I know he will allow me to point out to him one important piece of evidence.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. If I fail to notice it before I get through I will give the gentleman an opportunity to remind me of it. I should be glad, of course, to have the truth known in regard to this matter.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not desire to be misled or to mislead anybody in relation to a subject of this kind. I desire to understand the matter truthfully. I do not apprehend that there was any purpose on the part of this engineer to mislead anybody. He follows out what I have read with a whole lot of problems, which I am not competent to work out, but which the gentleman from the District may have worked out. I am not able to solve them, and I have not time to attempt it now. I have given his language, and I believe the whole of his language, on the question of the solidity of the foundation of this monument.

Now, there is one other proposition to which I desire to call attention and one other argument used by the Delegate from the District of Columbia which if unanswered might seem to have some force in it. I submit that if he wants to be entirely fair, and I know he does, he goes outside of the mark. I think it was unkind of him to talk about men being sordid in reference to this question. I do not like that kind of talk. I know that in debates like these gentlemen talk as they please, but I do not believe that those I represent are sordid upon this question.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman will allow me to say that the sordid persons to whom I referred were the members who long since preceded us here, and who failed to do their duty in respect to this monument.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I am coming to that. I do not like to hear that kind of talk. I do not yield to the gentleman in admiration of the grand achievements of this great man. His memory is as dear to me as it is to him. He has done as much for me as he ever did for the gentleman; he did it for all of us. But the argument which he makes that this property of thirty acres on which the monument stands is worth more than is asked for by this bill and is now the property of the commission to whom the work was formerly committed, is not to my mind exactly a fair one. The original act provided substantially that the commissioners, the corporation, should have this property for the purpose of erecting thereon a monument. It is hardly fair to say that we ought to make this appropriation because the commission is ready to reconvey this property to the Government. I do not want to speculate in real estate—we all speculate in real estate more or less in my part of the country. But this land was set apart for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of Washington, and I want no speculation by any body, not even the Government, in that land.

The law which created this commission—and I call the attention of gentlemen to it—the commission or corporation to which the title to this land was conveyed for the purposes set forth in the deed—contains this provision:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

And I have something else in relation to that in the records in this case. This commission having failed in its trust, not by any fault of its own but simply because the American people did not respond in money to their call for the building of such a monument as this; and I might, perhaps, stop here and give some reasons which prevented the commission from succeeding. One probably was that when the unsightly column reared itself so high that they could see it they did not feel like contributing more to it. It is not correct to argue that the Government will make money by this appropriation and resuming the possession of this land. In the gentleman's own report—I presume it is his report—if not, I beg his pardon——

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman is right.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. In speaking of the general management of this matter the gentleman says in his report:

Your committee deem it but just to the people that this conveyance of so important a reservation should be canceled and the title again vested in the United States.

This your committee believe it is entirely competent for Congress to do—

First. Because the charter act confirming the deed is repealable by its terms.

Second. Because the deed was made in trust, which trust, by the confession of the society, cannot be longer carried out; besides, the members of the society have by formal vote expressed a willingness to surrender their organization.

That is an answer to that part of the argument. The land belongs to the Government already; the right to repossess it is perfect and complete.

I do not know but I might properly stop now and say no more. I do not want to say a word beyond what I feel in duty bound to say, as I am a member of the committee which makes this report, to justify the vote which I shall give. But I will go on a little further and say that I do not believe we have been guilty of any injustice toward the memory of Washington. I do not believe there has been any ingratitude in the hearts of the American people toward that great man. They have builded a monument to him better and higher and broader than any that could be reared of stone. He is enshrined in the heart of every one who loves freedom. He lives and moves and controls to day by the memory of his glorious deeds and acts this great people more than any other man living or dead. It is unkind to say that the failure to complete this monument—which I can hardly restrain myself from characterizing in stronger terms than any I have yet used, but I will not do so—it is unkind to say that the failure to construct this monument is any evidence of ingratitude on the part of the American people.

That is not the reason it has not been finished. There is another reason that underlies all this, and which has had much to do in determining the action of Congress and the people upon this question. I represent here a constituency living many hundred miles away, a constituency not less patriotic, not less devoted to the great cause for which Washington so gloriously struggled, not less in love with his memory and his achievements than are those who live in this city. They have been appealed to, as have the rest of the people of this country. To what extent they have responded to those appeals I do not know. But they have been appealed to in the proper manner. This commission which was organized to build this monument was the proper medium for the solicitation of funds for the purpose. If my people have declined to contribute of their means for this purpose, I do not feel that I have any right to appropriate for this purpose money from the public Treasury which has been taken from them in the shape of taxes for the expenditures of the Government and apply it to finish this unhappy shaft upon this unsafe foundation.

I do not say there may not be found precedents for such an appropriation as is here asked for; I do not say that there may not be occasions when such appropriations may sometimes be made, and this may be a proper occasion, yet I do not feel that in times like the present, when the condition of the country is what every one knows it to be, (and I am not going to talk about that,) I do not feel that I have a right to vote $100,000 or $300,000 or any considerable sum for the completion of this unsightly, unstable shaft. And I do not believe, nor am I willing that it should go to the people of this country or be spread upon the record, that because I am unwilling to vote for this appropriation, therefore I am less patriotic, less in love with the achievements and the great events in which that great man participated, or less desirous to perpetuate his memory and hand down his bright example to those who will follow us, than are those who entertain different views upon this subject. I am not willing that any such record shall be made against me or those whom I represent on this floor.

Therefore I will say in conclusion, laying aside every other consideration but that of conviction founded upon a careful study and consideration of this subject—not a scientific study, for I am not an engineer, but a conviction founded on a careful survey and examination of this ill-shapen, badly put together structure, and the mixed blocks which form the foundation upon ordinary mold, as is stated in the report from which I have read, without any knowledge of what is below it, stratas of sand and gravel, the depth and thickness of which is unascertained—I am unwilling to vote more money to be expended upon it, for the reason that I do not believe it to be either safe or proper.

Now I believe that if you should go on and complete this monument—this opinion is not worth much and I do not give it as being worth much—I believe that if we complete this structure even upon the plan now proposed by the committee, the storms, the uncertain foundation, the swaying to and fro of such a column, will sooner or later bring it to the earth; and I want no monument erected to Washington by human hands which time can crumble. The monument which he now has can never be destroyed by wind or wave or storm, unless it be such a storm as shall sweep from the face of the earth the last human heart that loves freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I have felt called upon to attract the attention of members to these several views, because I have been just a little afraid that notwithstanding the "hard times" the patriotism of this House of Representatives, which I know is up to high tide, might under the energetic lead of the chairman of this committee be induced to make an appropriation for this purpose that ought not to be made. Leaving out every other consideration, I believe the attempt ought not to be made to piece out a structure which ought never to have been commenced in such a way and upon such a foundation. If a monument to Washington must be erected, let it be upon a foundation that is not mud, and marl, and gravel, and sand. If this is to be completed, let not the engineer tell you, as he does in his report, that he was unable to get through the stratum of gravel just below the foundation, that the difficulty of boring by reason of water coming in was so great and the means at his control were so small that he could not attempt except in general terms to say in a sort of guessing way that the foundation, if properly spread out, would be sufficient to support some structure of very considerable proportions, and that it is sufficient to support the structure with its present weight. That we already knew; we did not need any scientific man to tell us that, for we know that it does support it in an indifferent way. I believe we shall be doing wrong unless we require, before a dollar of appropriation is made for this monument, a more elaborate survey of the situation, of the foundation, of the condition of the soil, than we have had up to the present time. Why, sir, there is notice to us in this report of Lieutenant Marshall that if you should go on and erect this monument another hundred or two hundred feet high, and it should fall down at the first storm, you could not hold him to any sort of accountability. He has not told you and does not tell you except in a general way that the foundation is sufficiently strong; and after a fall had taken place in the structure, he might easily say that his report never covered this exact case.

Mr. STORM. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but he will allow me to ask whether in the report of Lieutenant Marshall the only doubt he expresses is not with regard to carrying the monument to the height of six hundred feet; whether he does not say it would be perfectly safe to carry it to the height of four hundred and thirty-seven feet.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. No, sir; he does not say that it would be perfectly safe if carried to the height of four hundred and thirty-seven feet. His report upon that point is expressed in very general terms indeed. I have read every extract from the report which in any direct manner answers that question. True, he submits a lot of problems which I cannot solve, but I would never vote money on such problems as those.

Mr. STORM. On the thirteenth page of his report he uses this language:

From which we find that the stability of the shaft at its point of least stability is 7.4 greater than necessary to insure safety.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. That is with reference to the monument as it stands now.

Mr. STORM. No, sir; it is his calculation with regard to carrying the monument to the height of four hundred and thirty-seven feet.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. On what page of the report is that?

Mr. STORM. On page 13, about the middle.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I read that same extract.

Mr. STORM. You did not read it all.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I think I did.

Mr. McCORMICK obtained the floor.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the gentleman from Arizona will indulge me a moment that I may say a few words in connection with the remarks just made by the gentleman from Illinois. The committee desire nothing more than that the problem as to the security of the foundations shall be fully solved before one dollar is expended toward the completion of this monument. No greater disgrace, certainly no greater calamity, could possibly befall the country than that the shaft after being once completed should fall to the ground. I can imagine a universal wail of sorrow going up over the whole land at such an event. But I hope, when we come to the question of action before the House, to suggest a provision in whatever bill may be voted upon that no money shall be expended until a further examination has been made and the officers of the Engineer Department have reported to the President that upon such further examination they are satisfied the work can go on to the height recommended. I am quite as much interested in having proper security against such a result as is the gentleman from Illinois. I would be unwilling to advise the House to construct any monument which might by chance at some future time fall to the ground. Indeed the chief reason for adopting the simple obelisk was its permanency and imperishability.

The gentleman bases his remarks in part upon what he fears or hopes or believes to be the public sentiment of his district. I wish to call his attention to an editorial clipped from the Chicago Inter-Ocean, a paper published in the city where he resides. Speaking of this monument and its proposed completion that paper says:

Efforts to this end have been made in every Congress for at least fifteen years, but without success. We are glad that this course is finally to be adopted, for the simple reason that it is an unpleasant feature of the national capital to see such a work abandoned and going to dilapidation. In its inception we believe it was in bad taste. George Washington's best monuments are the great nation which he helped to found and the record of his pure and patriotic life. He needed no such shaft as this to commemorate his deeds, and the money which has been and is to be wasted in its construction had much better have been devoted to some different purpose—to charity or to paying so much of the national debt. But there are so many good souls who feel that the work ought to go on that we are glad that action is to be taken in Congress which will secure that result.

The committee, in view of all the facts, recommend that the Government take the work off the hands of the association and assume the responsibility of its completion, which Congress will no doubt do. Uncle Sam does such jobs in first-class style, and with reasonable speed. We may, therefore, hope—those of us who may visit the national capital in the course of a few years—to see this great mammoth pillar looming up against the sky—the tallest work of the kind in the world.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to say to him, since he has quoted the remarks of that paper, that I recognize its author? It is an excellent paper and widely circulated. Still, of a dozen papers published in my city, it is the only one which has said a word on this subject. So far as I know it would not urge the building on such foundation and does not urge it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have not read the journals for the purpose of finding articles upon this subject. This one was specially brought to my attention.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I merely wish to say that it is scarcely fair to give an extract from one newspaper published where there are a dozen others, and say that it reflects the public sentiment when all the others may be on the other side, and besides that paper does not pretend to say that this particular plan should be adopted. I respect the papers, but I do not specially care whether they are for or against this, and know well enough they would all be against completing this shaft as proposed if they once saw that foundation.

Mr. CHIPMAN. No doubt the gentleman's judgment is independent on this subject. He has the reputation on this floor of forming an independent judgment. I only wished to call attention to the fact that even in Chicago, where there is no very friendly feeling in regard to the present location of the capital and its future adornment, the people there think it is the duty of Congress to complete the monument. And I might on this question of public opinion lay before the House similar expressions from every quarter of the Union, including the great journals of the nation's commercial metropolis.

Now in regard to this question of security of the foundations, I wish only to add to what appears in the reports and in the remarks already submitted, that in 1855 a committee of this House was appointed to examine the subject, and a report was made, a very full one, by a member from the State of Maryland, to which was appended a report of an officer of engineers of the Army stating his views upon this very subject, and he held that the foundations were entirely secure. Later Mr. Marshall made a report to the last Congress concurring in that opinion. And now, after a more careful examination, while he says he does not think the monument can be safely built to the height of six hundred feet, he recommends that it be built to a height of four hundred and forty feet. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] is quite right in saying that Lieutenant Marshall is not clear and distinct in saying that the foundations are secure for erecting the monument to any given height; but he does recommend to Congress that the shaft be completed to the height of four hundred and forty feet, and he certainly would not recommend that if he thought the foundations were insecure.

[Mr. McCORMICK addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. I desire to say one word more. There is another report pending before the House from this committee made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PELHAM,] who had the matter in charge, as chairman of a sub-committee. Although I was not a member of the sub-committee that visited Fredericksburgh for the purpose of inquiry into the condition of the tomb of Mary, the mother of Washington, the gentleman having that subject in charge not being here, I will say, that the committee agreed unanimously to recommend an appropriation of about $12,000 to complete that monument. It is, if possible, in a more disgraceful condition than the monument in this city to the memory of George Washington. It was partly destroyed during the war. It lay between the battle-lines of the Union and confederate forces and was in the midst of the camping-ground alternately of the Union and confederate troops. It has been defaced by curiosity-seekers until now one can hardly recognize it as a monument to any one. I think it is the duty of Congress, second only in importance to its duty to complete the Washington National Monument, to see that the effort to commemorate the memory of that woman who gave birth to so great a man is carried out. The committee are I believe unanimously in favor of making this appropriation. If this nation has ever contributed to perpetuate by monumental structure the memory of any woman, I do not now recall the instance. May we not do so in this instance as a graceful recognition, not only of her family, but of the mothers of the Revolution?

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SENER,] who takes a great interest in this matter and who is from the district where this tomb is located, has given his attention to the subject, and I hope he will address the House upon it. I should be glad to hear from him to-night.

Mr. SENER. Mr. Speaker, it is a curious fact in our progressive, utilitarian history which we are making day by day, that while we can always draw to this Chamber one hundred and fifty or two hundred men from all parts of the nation when wit is to be bandied, or when the question of the retention or dismissal of a clerk is to be considered, only fifteen or twenty Representatives of the people can be gathered here to consider the question of whether it is a paying business in this nation of ours, this grand experiment of self-government, to perpetuate the memory, and record in brass or stone our recognition of the virtues of those who gave birth to the Republic. I say it is a commentary, which I make not as a reproach upon my fellow-members, but it is a commentary that springs from that utilitarian spirit which threatens to sap the very life-blood of the Republic. Men seem to be forgetting the principles on which the Government was founded; men seem to be forgetting those springs of human action which governed the fathers of the Revolution when they brought into being that experiment of Government which we have developed into a great and magnificent Republic, spreading from ocean to ocean. If this Government is worth preserving, it is worth preserving on the basis of the principles in which it originated. If it is worth preserving, it is worth while to remember those who gave to it in the days of its infancy their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors. If it is worth while to remember these men, surely, above all and beyond all, it is worth while to remember that grand central figure who contributed so much to the success of the armies of the Revolution, and who brought out of the very fires of the Revolution the little band of patriots that established a Government which at that time was the admiration of the lovers of human freedom everywhere. To-day it is the first republic in the world, and of the first powers of the earth. I say that it is a patriotic duty to cherish the memory of this great man, and not only to cherish his memory and emulate his virtues, but if it is worth while to remember him, it is worth while to remember also that mother whose counsels made him what he was, and to whom he owed everything of his success in life.

I have only to say further, for I have prepared no speech, that the only trouble about the completion of this monument in my judgment seems to be this: that in the past few years so great has been the degeneracy touching the expenditure of public money, the great fear everywhere is that appropriations of public money will not be fairly, squarely, and honestly applied. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WARD,] who has spoken here to-night with such force as he always brings to bear upon every subject, has intimated that this scheme, as I understood him, never originated in any proper motive. That is to say, the love of Washington, the admiration of his patriotism, and of his efforts in our early struggles for independence were made instruments whereby some designing men operated upon the confidence of the American people in order to make money out of the construction of a monument. And this, taken with his opposition to the site and the objection to the foundation on account of its want of security, constitutes the only argument that is presented on the floor of the American Congress in opposition to the completion of this monument.

Can it be, Mr. Speaker, that in less than a century we have so far degenerated as to abandon so grand an undertaking for such reasons as these? Can it be that the American Congress will hesitate to appropriate money for this purpose because of the belief that the appropriation which may be made will be dishonestly applied? Can it be that we, as the representatives of the people, will say that our virtue is higher than that of the men who sent us here, and that such an appropriation if made will not be honestly applied? I say no; for I believe not in the utter degeneracy of the times. The time has come when we are about to unload; and I am satisfied that the Forty-third Congress is doing the work nobly and manfully, and that upon its skirts will hang no Credit Mobilier; that it will teach such lessons as will prove to all rings and corruptionists that the money of the Government when appropriated must be honestly and legitimately expended. I believe that the fear of any other result will work a wrong and injury, especially if it leads to a refusal to make an appropriation out of the public Treasury for both the monument here in Washington and the unfinished one to the mother of that great man at Fredericksburgh, Virginia—objects that challenge the admiration of the whole world, and command the sober approval of the whole American people.

I hope that these appropriations will both be made. Standing here as I do the representative of the district in which Washington was born, I wish I had the power and force to plead in successful tones even with the few men who have come here to-night actuated by the noble impulses of patriotism, the real importance of these two monumental propositions from the stand-point of a lofty patriotism that can never be too highly valued. I wish I could impress upon every member of this Congress the necessity of linking thepast and the present by these glorious memories.

While on my way to this Capitol to-night I heard the argument made against this proposition that the people of this country wanted to change the location of this capital, and therefore no more money ought to be spent for any public work here in Washington. In other words, that we are to go over again the history of the eastern and the western empire, to have two capitals; one here and the other on the Pacific slope or somewhere in the center of the continent. Sir, it matters not so much where the capital is situated. Railroads and telegraph lines, which did not exist in the days of Rome or in the earlier days of our Republic, have annihilated time and space, and better than anything in this utilitarian age are the glorious memories which help us to revive our admiration of the past, to preserve its sentiments and traditions; and because of its name and the great man whose history is blended with it, this national capital must long remain the cherished object of every American heart. Nor will the seat of the American government ever be hastily changed, however much the subject may be agitated. Talk not about forgetting those memories! Is there a man who has come to years of maturity who does not cherish the memories of the past above all things else? When the years come about him and the days grow on, when his own youth that he loved so well begins to ripen into maturer manhood, is there not something that tells each of us that the memories of childhood are the purest and that the affections and friendships of youth are the best? Applying the same reasoning, shall we ever forget the infancy of the Republic? Ought we ever to forget the men who helped to bring about its organization, who lent their aid in sustaining this Republic in its infancy and aided in laying the foundation of that power in virtue of which we are here to-night the representatives of a great, free, and powerful people?

But, as I said before, I have prepared no speech, and until the chairman of the committee called on me I had no expectation of saying a word. But I trust not only may these appropriations be made, but, as I said a few minutes ago, let those monuments be made connecting links between the memories of the past and the hopes of the future.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House in favor of the bill (H. R. No. 477) to establish an educational fund, and to apply the proceeds of the public lands to the education of the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Remarks on that subject are in order, under the condition fixed by the House for business at the present time.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, regarding this bill as one of vital importance and affecting the welfare of the country as a whole,

I desire to state briefly the considerations that lead me to give it my vote. That the interests it deals with are in fact vital and are the interests of the whole people, appears, I think, from a simple statement of its objects and provisions. It aims to promote education in every portion of the country, and to do it by distributing, on principles applicable to all parts alike, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands held by the General Government as the common property for the common good. Its title expresses its purpose, and the execution of this purpose is secured by the careful and well-considered terms in which the bill appears to be drawn. The fund is to be established by investing in United States bonds to be held in the United States Treasury, one-half of the net proceeds from the sale, entry, location, or other disposition of the public lands. The remaining half of such proceeds is to be apportioned and paid yearly, as such proceeds accrue, to the several Territories, States, and the District of Columbia in proportion to the population of each who are between the ages of four and twenty-one years. Together with this half of the net yearly sales, the interest at 5 per cent. on the accumulated and accumulating fund is also to be paid. The distribution of these proceeds and interest, though hereafter to be made on the basis of total population, as stated, is qualified by immediate and temporary needs, and for a period of five years is proportioned to the respective populations of the District, Territories, and States of ten years and upward who, as shown by the last published census of the United States, are unable to write.

These payments or distributive shares are provisional, but the conditions on which they depend are equitable, easily understood, and necessary to effect the objects and purposes which the fund and the yearly payments are intended to secure. The conditions require that each of the State Legislatures shall legally provide for the free education of all its children between the ages of six and sixteen, and that all moneys received in pursuance of this bill shall be applied according to its terms, that each may provide, within specified limits, for schools for the instruction of teachers, and that each, through its officers, shall make an annual report of the number of its public free schools, of the teachers employed, of the school-houses owned or hired, of the children taught, of the actual daily attendance, of the months of the year in which the schools have been actually maintained, and of the amounts appropriated by the Legislature of each State for maintaining free public schools within its own bounds. In the thirteenth section of the bill, well-guarded provision is made, as before said, for the carrying out of its general beneficial design.

Looking, then, only to the substance of the bill, as this general statement exhibits it, I give it my entire and hearty assent. It seems, so far as I can see, to be conceived in an eminently national spirit, and to be wisely adapted to the advancement of the national good. It goes upon the principle that popular education is an essential, indispensable condition, without which popular institutions must inevitably fall. This principle I take to be an axiom which no one here will dispute, and which no one need labor to defend. It is assumed in the bill that as a matter of fact there exists now in many parts of the country special and pressing needs for facilities and means of educating the people, which needs have arisen mainly in consequence of the late war, and which the resources of the local populations are inadequate to meet. That these needs do in truth exist, that they are urgent and great, that they ought to be supplied with the least possible delay, and that the benefits to result from supplying them, and the evils to result from not supplying them, will be benefits or evils—not exclusively of local, but essentially, also, of national concern—I take to be equally clear and incapable of dispute. I do not understand that in respect to any of these points, either of principle or fact, the bill is anywhere excepted to, but that the objections to which it is said to be open are against the exercise of power upon this subject by the national Government and to the application to such purposes of the national property. These legal and constitutional objections I shall not assume to discuss. But while the adequate decision of them may call perhaps for judicial determination, in the absence of such judgment we are by no means justified as Representatives of the people in refusing to vote upon the broad popular questions which this bill presents. I am unable to see upon what solid grounds objections of this character exist, and for this reason, and concurring in the opinion which the average intelligence of the people must hold, that the public welfare may lawfully and constitutionally be promoted by the General Government in the use of the public resources and means, I shall give to the measures proposed the support which is due to their comprehensive and beneficent aims. If doubts could fairly be admitted as to the practical results of these measures when adopted and put in operation, I think they ought still to be tried.

In a country like ours, with institutions bending to the caprice of popular sentiment, the people, irrespective of race or color, must be educated. The great interests of the nation demand that the opportunities for that education should be sown broadcast through the land, so that it may permeate all classes with its healthy influences. In no way can a portion of the resources of this great country be better bestowed than in strengthening the great system of common schools now established in the various States. The blessings and benefits derived from these are not confined to State lines but spread through the whole country, strengthening it with that best of all supports, an intelligent and virtuous people.

If the general purpose implied in fully educating the people should be kept in view by our Government, then it follows that any plan or scheme adopted should be broad and general in its scope. There is no portion of the country which can be neglected without detriment to the whole. This measure, framed in the spirit and supported from an earnest and honest conviction of the advantages it will confer upon the nation, ought to commend itself to every member of this House. Resting upon popular support, our republican institutions can only be sustained by a people who can intelligently decide between the lessons of patriotism and the corrupt teachings of demagogues. True, genuine education is alike the charm of social life, the the cause of business effort, the secret of artistic skill, the base of all scientific investigation, the foundation of all true statesmanship, and the corner-stone of that republican equality on which our Government rests.

The exigencies of the case demand that aid should be rendered. This aid, to some considerable extent, would certainly be afforded by the distribution of these means now in our power to bestow. The bill proposes no interference with existing rights in regard to preemptions or homesteads, no limitation of congressional power over the public domain, and no interference with the granting of bounty lands to the soldiers of our late war. Its provisions are so well qualified and guarded that no serious or permanent embarrassment or difficulty can in any way arise from its enactment; and the failure of it to do all that can be desired, or to realize moderate and just expectations, can be readily met by modification or repeal. I am in favor of giving it a trial. I believe it will succeed and vindicate the wisdom, as it will certainly attest the patriotism and the national spirit of the Congress by which it is attempted. The experiment, if such it can be called, is an experiment whose successful issues would be blessings of incalculable value, wide as the country itself, and strengthening the essence and forces of its life. I hope the bill as its stands, in its scope and in its details, will receive the sanction of this House.

SOUTHERN TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, there is upon the Calendar a bill, reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to incorporate the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, upon which I wish to address the House to-night. I have no disposition to discuss at length the various provisions of that bill or the grave constitutional question which it involves. I desire simply to state in a general way and as briefly as I can some of the considerations which influenced me in withholding my assent from the report of the majority of my committee recommending its passage and induce me to oppose it now.

The bill provides for the incorporation of a company to be known as the "Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company," and authorizes and empowers said company to lay out, locate, and construct a railroad and telegraph line from a point named therein on the west bank of the Mississippi River, in the State of Arkansas, to the city of San Francisco, in the State of California, and also a branch road and telegraph line from a point in the county of Sedgwick, in the State of Kansas, to be determined by said company, to a point to be selected by it on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, in the vicinity of the boundary line between the Indian Territory and the State of Texas.

My first objection to it is that we have no constitutional power to enact it into a law. I do not agree with the statements which we have heard so frequently of late upon the floor of this House and elsewhere, that Congress has power, whenever it likes or sees good occasion to do it, to charter a railroad over and across any State. On the contrary, I deny that it has any such power, and assert that there is no clause of the Constitution which confers it directly, or by any fair implication authorizes its exercise.

Says Justice Story:

> Whenever a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a particular power, the first question is, whether the power be expressed in the Constitution. If it be, the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be, whether it is properly an incident to an express power and necessary to its execution. If it be, then it may be exercised by Congress. If not, Congress cannot exercise it.—Story on the Constitution, volume 2, section 1243.

And when these inquiries are made in this case, it will, in my judgment, be most clearly apparent that we have no constitutional power to create a corporation of the kind proposed by this bill. Such a power is not to be found among those enumerated in the Constitution. We find there the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, to borrow money, to regulate commerce, to establish post-offices and post-roads, and to do many other things. (Constitution, article 1, section 8.) But among all these enumerated powers of Congress we do not find the power to incorporate a railroad company. The word "incorporate" or "incorporation" is not even to be found there, while it is well known as a historical fact that a proposition to authorize Congress to create corporations was more than once rejected by the Convention which formed the Constitution.

The general power "to grant charters of incorporation," the power "to grant charters of incorporation in cases where the public good may require them and the authority of a single State may be incompetent," and the power "to grant letters of incorporation for canals," were each in turn refused to the General Government. (Journal of Convention 260-376.) And the rejection of these several propositions by that body proves, if anything ever was proven, that it was not intended that Congress should have the express, substantive, and independent power to erect a corporation of any kind. But judicial authority is not wanting, if such be required, to forever put at rest any claim that may be made in this direction. The Supreme Court of the United States decided as long ago as the year 1819, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that no express power to create corporations had been given to Congress by the Constitution.

Chief Justice Marshall in deciding that case said:

> Among the enumerated powers we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. * * * * Had it been intended to grant this power as one which should be distinct and independent, to be exercised in any case whatever, it would have found a place among the enumerated powers of the Government. (4 Wheaton, 406, 421. See, also, Osborn vs. United States Bank, 9 Wheaton, 860.)

This power, then, if it exists at all, must be implied as incidental to some one or more of those which have been given to us in express terms. It can exist in no other way. But before it can exist even in this way it must appear that it is a direct mode of executing an express power. The rule was so laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in the case to which I have just referred. In delivering his opinion, he said:

> The power of creating a corporation is never used for its own sake, but for the purpose of effecting something else. No sufficient reason is therefore perceived why it may not pass as incidental to those powers which are expressly given, if it be a direct mode of executing them. (4 Wharton, 411.)

Now, if it be implied as incidental only to those powers which are expressly given, to which of them does it in this case belong as such incident? With which of them is it coupled as an appendage necessary to carry it into execution? What natural or necessary connection is there between any of the enumerated powers and the incorporation of a company to build a railroad through the various States and Territories from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean? I cannot conceive that there is any whatever. The connection between the incorporation of such a company and the building of such a railroad is perfectly obvious. The creation of the one will be at once conceded as the usual, convenient, and necessary means for the construction of the other. But the difficulty lies in the want of express power to build the railroad itself, and in our being again compelled to resort to implication to obtain such power; and this difficulty cannot be overcome. For it will be extending the doctrine of implication entirely too far to say that this power, which carries with it the right of eminent domain within the limits of the States through which the railroad may pass, takes away the jurisdiction of such States over their own territory without their consent, and strikes at the very root of local self-government, was ever intended to be given or ever was given to the Federal Government. It is too unreasonable to suppose that such power was left to implication, when the same section and article of the Constitution from which it must be implied, if at all, declares that the United States cannot purchase land in any State for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dock-yard, or other needful building, until it has first obtained the consent of the Legislature of such State. (Article 1, section 8 of Constitution.) To so decide will, in my judgment, not only require the greatest stretch of the imagination, but will be a most manifest, palpable, and outrageous usurpation of authority. There is no power whatever that we cannot assume to exercise if we can pass such a bill as this. All that will have to be done in any case to accomplish our purpose will be simply to declare that the act contemplated is "necessary and proper" for the execution of some one of the enumerated powers of Congress. Any rule of construction that will give us the power in this case will give it in all others. And we may thus, first upon one pretext and then upon another, extend it until we not only make the implied powers greater than those which are expressly given, but so amend, by construction, the Constitution as to free ourselves entirely from all the restraints which it now imposes, and change the whole theory and practice, if not ultimately the very form and character of the Government.

If we inquire from what clause of the Constitution it is contended that the power in this case is derived, what will be the result? Ordinarily there is no difficulty in determining the particular article and section of that instrument from which any legislative or other power is drawn, and there should be none in any case. Yet I venture to assert that no two of the advocates of this bill will be able to agree upon or refer me to the same section or clause of the Constitution as the one which confers upon us the power to enact it into a law. One will tell you that it is derived from the power to regulate commerce among the States; another will say that it comes from the power to establish post-offices and post-roads; a third will attribute it to the provision which declares that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare, or to the one which empowers us to declare war; while still another, unwilling to confine himself to any one of the enumerated powers, in designating its source will insist that it is derived from all of them combined. This circumstance ought not to be overlooked in considering this question. The fact of such disagreement is at least some evidence that no such power exists. To my mind it is almost, if not quite, conclusive evidence of its non-existence, because it is fair to assume that when one thing becomes the appropriate and necessary means for carrying into effect another, the necessity will be so apparent as to enable men of intelligence, judgment, and discrimination to perceive it without resorting to all kinds of special pleading to establish the dependence of the one upon the other or to trace the connection between them.

But, sir, the proposition that the power to build a railroad through a State cannot be implied from any or all of those which are expressly given to the General Government is well sustained by authority, which ought not to be lightly disregarded. The identical question at issue here, so far as the principle is involved, was discussed and decided by Mr. Madison in 1817, in his veto of what is known as the "Bank bonus bill," which was an act pledging and setting apart certain funds for the construction of roads and canals and for the purpose of making other internal improvements. Mark his language. Nothing can be clearer or more explicit and unequivocal. He said:

> I am constrained by the insuperable difficulty I feel in reconciling the bill with the Constitution of the United States to return it with that objection to the House of Representatives in which it originated. The legislative powers vested in Congress are specified and enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, and it does not appear that the power proposed to be exercised by the bill is among the enumerated powers, or that it falls by any just interpretation within the power to make laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution those or other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States.
> The power to regulate commerce among the several States cannot include a power to construct roads and canals and to improve the navigation of water-courses in order to facilitate, promote, and secure such a commerce without a latitude of construction departing from the ordinary import of the terms, strengthened by the known inconveniences which doubtless led to the grant of this remedial power to Congress. To refer the power in question to the clause "to provide for the common defense and general welfare," would be contrary to the established and consistent rules of interpretation.

Hear, again, this distinguished statesman, who has justly been called the father of the Constitution. In a letter to Edward Livingston, dated Montpelier, April 17, 1824, he said:

> My impression is also very decided, that if the construction which brings canals within the scope of commercial regulations had been advanced or admitted by the advocates of the Constitution in the State conventions, it would have been impossible to overcome the opposition to it. It is remarkable that Mr. Hamilton himself, the strenuous patron of an expansive meaning in the text of the Constitution, with the views of the convention fresh in his memory, and in a report contending for the most liberal rules of interpretation, was obliged by his candor, to admit that they could not embrace canals.—Madison's Writings, volume 3, pages 435, 436; see also volume 4, pages 147, 148.

To the same effect was the opinion of Mr. Monroe, as stated in his message vetoing the "Cumberland road bill" in 1822. After expressing his regret at being compelled to object to the passage of the bill, the policy of which met with his full approval, because of his conviction that Congress did not have the power under the Constitution to enact such a law, he said:

> A power to establish turnpikes with gates and tolls and to enforce the collection of tolls by penalties implies a power to adopt and execute a system of internal improvement. A right to impose duties, to be paid by all persons passing a certain road and on horses and carriages, as is done by this bill, involves the right to take land from the proprietor on a valuation and to pass laws for the protection of the road from injuries; and if it exist as to one road it exists as to any other, and to as many roads as Congress may think proper to establish. A right to legislate for one of these purposes is a right to legislate for the others. It is a complete right of jurisdiction and sovereignty for all the purposes of internal improvement. * * * I am of opinion that Congress does not possess this power; that the States individually cannot grant it, for although they may assent to the appropriation of money within their limits for such purposes, they can grant no power of jurisdiction or sovereignty by special compacts with the United States. The power can be granted only by an amendment to the Constitution and in the mode prescribed by it. If the power exist, it must either be because it has been specifically granted to the United States or that which is incidental to some power which has been specifically granted. If we examine the specific grants of power, we do not find it among them, nor is it incidental to any power which has been specifically granted. It never has been contended that the power was specifically granted. It is claimed only as being incidental to some one or more of the powers which are specifically granted. The following are the powers from which it is said to be derived:
> First. From the right to establish post-offices and post-roads. Second. From the right to declare war. Third. To regulate commerce. Fourth. To pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare. Fifth. From the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof. Sixth, and lastly. From the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States. According to my judgment it cannot be derived from either of those powers, nor from all of them united; and in consequence does not exist.

Such, too, was the opinion of Andrew Jackson, declared and published in his veto of the "Maysville road bill," on the 27th day of May, 1830. He said:

> The constitutional power of the Federal Government to construct or promote works of internal improvement presents itself in two points of view: the first, as bearing upon the sovereignty of the States within whose limits their execution is contemplated, if jurisdiction of the territory which they may occupy be claimed as necessary to their preservation and use; the second, as asserting the simple right to appropriate money from the national Treasury in aid of such works when undertaken by State authority, surrendering the claim of jurisdiction. In the first view the question is an open one, and can be decided without the embarrassment attending the other, arising from the practice of the Government. Although frequently and strenuously attempted the power to this extent has never been exercised by the Government in a single instance. It does not in my opinion possess it, and no bill, therefore, which admits it can receive my official sanction.

In the letter of Mr. Madison to Edward Livingston, from which I have already quoted, the position of Alexander Hamilton upon this question is clearly defined. But as he was the great advocate of a strong federal government and the leader of those who favored a most liberal construction of the Constitution, such a construction as would tend towards a centralization of power, I desire to read a single sentence from a letter written by him to Jonathan Dayton in 1799 in which he distinctly recognizes the fact that Congress has no such power as is here claimed:

An article ought to be proposed to be added to the Constitution for empowering Congress to open canals in all cases in which it may be necessary to conduct them through the territory of two or more States, or through the territory of a State and that of the United States.—Works of Hamilton, volume 6, page 386.

I might multiply these authorities almost indefinitely by adding the weight of one great name to that of another. But I will not. I will content myself with a further reference to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which seems to me to settle most conclusively the exact principle involved in the passage of this bill. In the case of Gilman vs. Philadelphia, decided at the December term, 1865, the court, Mr. Justice Swayne delivering the opinion, said:

The national Government possesses no powers but such as have been delegated to it. The States have all but such as they have surrendered. The power to authorize the building of bridges is not to be found in the Federal Constitution. It has not been taken from the States. It must reside somewhere. They had it before the Constitution was adopted, and they have it still. (3 Wallace, 725.)

I admit, sir, that the extraordinary power required for the passage of this bill has at times been assumed by Congress. I know that precedents can be found which seemingly uphold and sanction such legislation as this. But we are not bound by any such precedents. For, as has been well said, "precedents may evidence, but do not sanction at any time a violation of the Constitution of the United States. The unyielding exactions of that instrument are like the Divine ones from Mount Sinai, constant, continuing commands which no Congress should disregard." Besides, in this instance, an examination of such precedents and of the circumstances under which most, if not all, of them were established, will convince any unprejudiced mind that they are entitled to no consideration whatever at our hands. You may take any one of the acts incorporating the various companies that have been chartered by Congress to build railroads through the States, and you will find that the question of power under the Constitution to create them, was in no single case fully discussed, and brought directly to the attention either of this House or the Senate, and that they were passed at a time when it was the custom to violate the plainest provisions of the Constitution, and when to even talk about obedience to it was regarded as a crime. So that they are wholly deprived of whatever weight and character as authority we might otherwise be disposed to give them, and we are left to act upon our own judgment, free from any embarrassment, so far as they are concerned, and aided and directed by the interpretation and opinions of those who assisted in making and putting into successful operation the Constitution itself, and of the other jurists and statesman of our country who have made for themselves a name and fame that shall last as long as time itself.

But, sir, if we admit that we have the power under the Constitution to construct or to authorize the construction of railroads through the States without their consent, there is still an objection to this bill, which, it seems to me, ought to prove fatal to its passage unless we propose to charter indiscriminately, without investigation and without any inquiry into the propriety of our action, every company of every kind that may choose to ask of us a certificate of incorporation. I submit that there is no necessity for the building of this road at this time, and that no public good can possibly arise from incorporating this company to undertake its construction. We have one railroad already completed to the Pacific coast. Two other companies have been chartered and have commenced work upon their respective roads. When they shall have finished them no more through lines will be required, for years to come, to accommodate the business interests of the country through which they pass or to establish commercial intercourse between the East and the States lying west of the Rocky Mountains. And as for local trade or traffic there is, I may say, absolutely none to demand the building of this road, for it will run for the greater part of its entire length through an uninhabited or sparsely settled country, the business of which will certainly prove insufficient to pay the interest upon the money that will be required to purchase the rolling-stock alone necessary to operate it after it shall have been built. So that it is perfectly idle, worse than folly, to talk about building it now, especially when every man of sense knows that in the present distressed financial condition of the country it could not be built if it were ever so desirable that it should be. The fact that the gentlemen named in the bill are willing to undertake to build it signifies nothing. It ought not to be considered by us at all in determining whether we will or will not confer upon them the exclusive privileges asked by them, for such an undertaking, while it may and doubtless will prove profitable to those who may be directly engaged in its management, if they enter upon it, cannot fail to be most mischievous in its consequences and fraught with evil, disaster, and ruin to hundreds and thousands who will be induced to invest their capital in it upon the representations of these men.

I know, sir, that we are not to constitute ourselves the guardians of the private interests of the people upon all occasions. But at the same time I believe that we ought, and that it is a part of our sworn duty, to so legislate as to check this improvident spirit of speculation that is abroad in the land, to which the great financial crisis through which we are now passing is declared by many to be directly attributable, rather than to excite, encourage, and stimulate it by the passage of such a bill as this.

But, sir, there is another objection to the passage of this bill to which I desire to direct your attention for a single moment. Section 7 provides—

That the said company is authorized to accept to its own use any grant, donation, loan, aid, or assistance which may be given to, or conferred upon, said company by the Congress of the United States, by the Legislature of any State, or by any corporation, person, or persons.

This means a continuation of the policy of subsidizing these corporations and monopolies. It means that we shall commit ourselves to a donation of millions, it may be tens of millions, of acres of our most valuable public land, and millions of money besides, to these men to aid in the construction of this road which they now appear so anxious to have an opportunity to build upon their own responsibility. Disguise it as they may, this is their clear, obvious, unmistakable intent and purpose, and you may rest assured that this bill will no sooner be enacted into a law than they will again be here importuning and beseeching us for aid, both land and money, and that in their efforts to obtain such help they will refer to this very section, and declare that by it we have fully committed ourselves to a compliance with their request, and that to refuse them will be a breach of good faith upon our part. At any rate, this is my honest conviction in regard to it, so that for this reason, if for no other, I would vote against the bill, believing as I do that this policy of granting large and extensive tracts of our public land to railroads and other corporations is wrong in principle and contrary to the spirit of our free institutions, and that to continue it in the way in which it has been commenced and persisted in during the past twelve years will be to endanger not only the prosperity but the very existence of our Republic.

[Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, then addressed the House upon the civil-rights bill. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

COLLECTION DISTRICTS IN NEW JERSEY.

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, although the session this evening was called for the purpose of discussing the bill making appropriations for the completion of the Washington monument, I find the consideration of other questions has been allowed, and I will ask the attention of the House for a short time to a matter which concerns a large number of the inhabitants of my State and district.

It will be remembered by members of this House that in February last a very remarkable speech was delivered by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, endeavoring to point out abuses which existed in the administration of the Government and making suggestions for their removal. In that speech a table was submitted, showing the amount of revenue received from customs, the number of persons employed, their aggregate compensation, and the percentage of cost of collecting the revenue in each customs district in the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1873. A table was also submitted showing the number of ports where no revenue was received from customs for the same period. From the latter table we we learn that there are thirty-two customs districts from which no revenue is received, but the compensation paid the collectors, deputy collectors, and inspectors engaged in the laborious business of "doing nothing," amounted to $75,259.78!

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this statement is correct, and the officers at the thirty-two ports named in the table have no legitimate duties other than the pretext of collecting revenue, there should be but one opinion on the part of the members of this Congress as to their duty of abolishing these customs districts.

But, Mr. Speaker, the collection of revenue is but a part of the duties devolving upon collectors. If I am correctly informed as to their duties, they are required, first, to register, enroll, and license all vessels built and owned in their districts; second, to exercise and enforce police regulations preventing the illegal entry of all goods and merchandise subject to duty; third, collect revenue.

The first-named duty of the collectors is one of great importance in districts where there are a large number of vessels built and owned, especially when we consider that the custom is almost universal for each vessel to be owned by different parties, and that any change of ownership must be recorded in the office of the collector of the district where said vessel is owned.

Now, sir, I find in the table enumerating the ports where no duties are collected the names of two located in the district which I have the honor to represent, namely, the ports of Bridgeton and Great Egg Harbor. In both of these collection districts a large number of vessels is owned, and every year the number is increased by the building of additional ones.

In answer to a letter addressed to the collector of the port of Bridgeton, I received the following statement, which I submit for the consideration of the House:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BRIDGETOWN, NEW JERSEY,
Collector's Office, April 1, 1874.

SIR: I herewith send you some statistics of this collection district.

Number of enrolled vessels, (by enrolled vessels, I mean vessels over 20 tons,) 182; total tonnage of the above 182 vessels, 14,000 tons; about forty of the above are large coasters, the balance are schooners of smaller capacity. Number of owners to the above 182 vessels, 800. Also 125 small vessels under 20 tons; total tonnage 1,500. These vessels are enaged in the oyster trade. Number of owners, 200. Also 4 steamers; aggregate tonnage 1,000 tons. Number of owners not given; owned by stock companies.

RECAPITULATION.

	Number vessels.	Tons.
Over twenty tons, sailing	182	14,000
Under twenty tons, sailing	125	1,500
Steam	4	1,000
Total	311	16,500

Total number of owners, 1,000. Value of vessel property, $1,000,000.

It will be seen by the above statement that the number of vessels of all sizes and descriptions is 311, with a total tonnage of 16,500 tons, and that the ownership, amounting to $1,000,000, is divided among 1,000 persons. From a statement received from the collector of Egg Harbor district, I learn that the number of vessels of all sizes and descriptions in that district is 138, with a total tonnage of 16,018 tones, and the ownership, amounting to near $1,000,000, is divided among 1,442 persons.

From the above facts it will be seen that the continuance of these two ports is undoubtedly required by the large maritime interests of the districts. Article 2 of an act passed December 31, 1792, reads thus:

A vessel's home port is that at or nearest to which the owner resides, or, if there be more than one owner, to the port at or nearest to which the husband or managing owner usually resides.

In view of the existence of this law, it will be readily perceived that the whole vessel interest would be disarranged if those collection districts should be abolished.

As a necessary consequence, the business of enrolling, registering, and licensing would be transferred to the port of Philadelphia, thereby entailing great expense, hardship, and inconvenience upon the owners and builders of vessels in the districts to which I have alluded. The present policy of our Government is to foster commerce, both foreign and domestic, and I do not believe that this Congress is prepared to take any steps, even under the lead of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to abolish any ports of entry whereby the commercial interests of any section of our country will be injured, even if a small outlay is required to compensate collectors of said ports.

Mr. Speaker, let us now consider the second duty of the collector of a port, namely, to exercise and enforce police regulations preventing the illegal entry of all goods and merchandise subject to duty.

In the Bridgeton district this duty is not so important, from the fact that it does not border on the sea-coast; but still there is need of such supervision, as the district includes the eastern shore of Delaware Bay and River and the navigable streams tributary thereto, to within a few miles below the city of Camden, thus affording facilities for the illegal landing of merchandise. The Egg Harbor district commences at Cape May, and includes all the sea-coast, bays, and inlets between that point and Brigantine Inlet, a distance of sixty miles.

This coast is in the direct line of all the vessels trading between Cuba, New York, and other eastern ports and the commerce entering the port of Philadelphia from Europe. This coast is easily approached, and with its numerous bays, inlets, and navigable streams leading into the interior, thus affording great facilities for smuggling large quantities of duty-paying merchandise. It is therefore very important that vigilant police regulations should be exercised on the part of the Government to protect its revenue. This can be most efficiently done by having in this district a faithful collector to enforce the revenue laws and protect the Government from fraud.

All the ports on the coast of New Jersey need the same police regulations as the one above mentioned. These ports were established when our foreign commerce was small, compared with the present; consequently, there is far greater need for their existence now than when established, even though their continuance entails some expense upon the Government.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it would be a delightful condition of affairs if all the police regulations connected with the collection of the revenue could be abolished—that all parties owing tribute to the Government would come willingly to the receivers of customs; then our revenue marine might be abolished, and the large sums expended annually for its efficient equipment might be applied to the payment of the public debt; but unfortunately the millennium has not yet come, and I hazard nothing in saying that for many years to come the Government will be obliged to expend money to make its revenue marine still more efficient, and for the payment of collectors at various ports of entry to guard its revenue against the designs of evil-doers.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to consider another duty of a collector—that of collecting custom duties; and so far as the two districts under consideration are concerned I shall be obliged to conflict with the table submitted by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. According to that table, the expense of the office of the port of Bridgeton for the year ending 1873, amounted to $849.39, without one cent of revenue being collected.

I herewith submit a statement from the collector of the above port, showing the amount collected and expenses of same:

The amount of money collected for the year 1873	$2,800

The whole cost to the United States to collect the above amount is as follows:

Salary of one collector	$250
Office rent	100
Commissions, 3 per cent. on money collected	84
Total expense to the Government	434

Besides there is one deputy at Goshen, and one deputy at Mauricetown. Neither of the above receives any compensation from the United States.

From the above statement, for the accuracy of which I will vouch, it is shown that $2,800 was collected for the year 1873, and that the whole expense, including salary, office rent, and commissions, was only $434; showing a balance in favor of the Government of $2,366.

This I know is a small item, but it shows conclusively that the Government is deriving a revenue from this port of entry, and further shows that the table submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means was faulty so far as this port was concerned.

I also have a statement from the collector of the port of Egg Harbor, showing the amount of duties that has been saved to the Government during the last twelve years. The vessels enumerated were driven on the coast in the Egg Harbor district and were taken charge of by the collector until they could be delivered at their respective places of destination. The duties were estimated by Mr. Blodgett from manifests in possession of the collector.

OFFICE OF GENERAL APPRAISER,
Custom-House, Philadelphia, February 21, 1874.

General list of duties on cargoes ashore at Great Egg Harbor district, estimated:

Ship Merrimac	$100,000
Bark James Cook	8,000
Bark Charles Poole	2,000
Ship Mortimer Livingston	50,000
Brig Henrica	8,000
Brig Tropic Bird	5,500
Ship Elizabeth	4,500
Ship Electric	150,000
Bark Lawrence	2,000
Steamship Jamaica	15,000
Brig Dashaway	3,000
Brig Allies, (wool and cotton)	45,000
Ship Andressen, (casks, &c.)	10,000
Schooner Lottie Klotz, (sugar)	18,000
Total	421,000

ISRAEL S. ADAMS,
Collector of Customs District and Port of Great Egg Harbor, New Jersey.

From this statement it appears that the large sum of $421,000 in duties was saved to the Government in a great measure by the vigilance and efficiency of the present collector of that port. I have not a detailed statement of the expenses of the officers of this port, (two in number,) but I am well satisfied that the cost is much less than that stated in the table referred to, which places the amount for the last year at $1,656.58. Even if the cost of sustaining the officers of this port is what is stated, it certainly cannot be considered a large outlay when we take into consideration the large amount saved in duties to the Government, besides the efficient police regulations exercised and the great convenience to vessel-owners resident in the district.

Mr. Speaker, from the statement and facts presented, I think this House will come to the conclusion that neither the revenues of the Government nor the commercial interests of either of these collection districts will be improved by their abolition. As has been stated, these ports of entry were established at the close of the last century, and have existed through all the adminstrations of the Government up to the present time, consequently no political significance can be attached to their existence and continuance.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, if we were in possession of all the facts in connection with many other ports enumerated as collecting no duty, we should find that the statement in regard to them would be as erroneous as the two ports in my district to which I have called the attention of the House.

I cannot better conclude these hasty remarks than by quoting the language of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in correcting an error in the same speech which contained the erroneous tables commented upon. He says:

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means speaks with such commanding authority, that it is especially important he should found his conclusions upon correct data.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, all monuments are a part of history. Every monument erected to a great man, or in memory of a great event, illustrates something in history. It is a constant mortification to the people of the United States, when they come to this city, to see that mutilated monument about which so much has been said, and so patriotically, this evening. I hope something will be done to rescue that monument from its present condition, although I fear it is now a symbol of the condition of our Government. I have said that all monuments represent something historical. I am not sure but I would vote for an appropriation either to finish the monument or to put it into some better and more classical shape.

I have traveled somewhat and have seen some of those monuments which have come down to us from other ages and other epochs. I cannot but remember this evening the monument which I saw once in Rome to Titus, the conqueror of Jerusalem. On that monument, in the form of an arch, was represented all that could confirm our Bible in regard to the siege of Jerusalem. It commemorated, as they supposed, in eternal marble or stone the conquest of that city by Rome.

I am not thoroughly a believer in this obelisk which comes from Egypt, the simple shaft going up into the air to a considerable altitude and having very little significance. I should prefer some arch like that of Milan, or some temple of fame like that of Munich, or something like the arch of Titus, or the Arch of Triumph which has represented many historic memories for France.

But irrespectively of what the monument may be, it belongs to the American people before our centennial to memorize something of our earlier and better days. What it may cost is for these gentlemen to determine and for the House to vote, but one thing is very sure, that the American people desire before their hundredth anniversary to have something significant in reference to George Washington. The other day in my city when the decoration of the heroes of our recent civil war took place, processions marched by and decorated the statue of our President, Mr. Lincoln, but not one tribute of flowers was placed on the statue of George Washington. Even Nero had a friend to lay a bouquet upon his grave. It is a sign, sir, of our decadence. And I do trust that the American people may do something wiser and better and kinder in this regard.

But I rose principally, Mr. Speaker, to say that our American national metropolis is derelict in many duties. We should have decorated this capital. There is no taste as yet displayed according to the best tastes of mankind in much of the art of this capital. I have offered resolutions on this subject, and had them sent to the Committee on the Library. They are buried there, truncated like Washington's monument. I do not know, sir, but that we ought to make a motion and pass it to dismiss this Joint Committee on the Library who do so little—who do nothing except to give bouquets.

The artists of America are interested in having something better at our capital to illustrate our national history and glory. We have nothing as yet comparable to what the other nations have at their capitals. We have rude art here as yet; and yet they take no advice from artists. I cannot tell you why, sir, because I do not know the influences which prevail around the capital.

But one thing is sure. Unless the American Congress give their nicest heed to something more æsthetic, something more tasteful, something more historic, something more in the line of true art than they have hitherto done, our national capital will be so thoroughly demoralized that it ought to be moved out West.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would not New York be a better place for it?

Mr. COX. My friend from Ohio suggests New York. New York is full of artists, and none are more eminent than gentlemen who have graduated from my friend's own State. I think the best artists in New York, including Mr. Ward, came from his own neighborhood. I am proud to recognize them as the first almost in their guild in New York.

But, sir, from some influences which nobody knows, the kindliest influences perhaps, this capital has not been properly cared for in the line of art. And I only rose to-night for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee on the Library and of the members of this House to the fact that we are disgraced all over the world by our utterly disgusting performances in the line of art. If you do raise this obelisk which comes from Egypt, a barbarian country that never had art, I do not believe it will succeed in impressing the American people in a proper way with the virtues and the greatness of George Washington. I would like to see something that would give to the American people the idea in marble or in stone that we had once a nation and a race of heroes in the early days before my friend, the Delegate from this District, fought and bled and almost died for his country. I would like to have something done here to illustrate the greatness of our fight for independence.

George Washington did not fight for liberty altogether, but for independence; and independence in one sense is larger than liberty. Our ancestors never fought for liberty. They had all their liberties, and when the English Crown strove to take their liberties from them, they fought for independence. They bowed for many years before the English Crown and the English Crown did not heed their prayers, though very submissive. But at last they struck for independence. And I would like to see some monument—not to liberty altogether, for George Washington was himself a slave-holder, but to independence of foreign domination, and in all the relations which this country bears to all the world.

Therefore, sir, I would hope when we consider this matter in the House in reference to an appropriation of money that we shall have all the eloquence that we have heard this night concentrated in favor of some mode, I care not exactly what, that will, before the centennial at least, relieve Washington City from the disgrace of a truncated monument to the father of our country.

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I beg the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I present my views on this important proposition, and when I say important, I mean it in the broadest sense of the term. I believe a more important measure could not at the present come before Congress, one that will in my opinion, if it should become a law and be enforced, be attended by the very worst results, and will disappoint the friends of the measure and greatly injure those that were intended to be benefited thereby. I regret that the opposition to the bill was not characterized with a better spirit, that some gentlemen seized the opportunity in discussing the bill to abuse and attempt to cast odium upon the colored race. I do not envy the head or heart of any man here or elsewhere who exhibits, to say the least, such bad taste, and temper as to try directly or indirectly to cast reproach upon the colored people of our country; they merit no such treatment. None but a cold, unfeeling, and I might add unpatriotic man could entertain such sentiments, and they are unworthy in my humble opinion to emanate from American legislators, and I would be untrue to the colored people whom I represent and have always stood by me if I did not so characterize them. We should be governed in all things by reason and judgment, and not by prejudice and passion; and when statesmen are making laws they should at least make them good and wholesome, (to use an old-fashioned term our father's used.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, will this bill if it become a law work harm or good to the whole American people, or especially to those that it is intended to benefit? If I believed that the law would have the effect that some of the gentlemen upon this floor say it will, it would afford me pleasure to vote for it. I certainly can have no prejudice or feeling against the colored race. I would not do one act knowingly that would injure them in the least particular. I was born and reared in their midst and have been identified with the institution of slavery, and I arrogate to myself that I know as much about the colored race as any living man. I was his friend and advocate in the war for the suppression of the rebellion. I voted to make him a free man; advocated and sustained all the amendments to the State and Federal constitutions for his advancement and protection. I have voted to tax myself and the other white people of my county and State for their education, and I feel that I did my duty as a good citizen in the best interest of my country, looking to its present and future success. I have no regret for what I did for the colored race, and trust I may never have cause to regret.

Mr. Speaker, would it not be well for us to pause a little and look the whole ground over, and see whether we are going to better the colored race by the passage of this bill or whether we are going to strike a blow that will greatly retard their education and advancement? But we are told that the colored people demand it and are clamorous for it. I do not believe it. I am satisfied that the colored people of my district do not want the school feature of the bill, and I represent as intelligent colored people as there are to be found in the Southern States. Out of a federal population of about one hundred and forty thousand there are but eleven thousand colored, and many of them educated and teaching the colored children. They are contented with sending their children to their own schools, and when they have not colored teachers they are satisfied with competent white ones. Our people are anxious to aid the colored people to educate their children with a few exceptions, and these exceptions will soon disappear. My State did not go as far as I had desired or had hoped in providing a common-school fund for the education of both white and colored, but all things considered did well. The law setting apart the funds for the education of our children makes no distinction on account of color, although the greater part comes from the whites.

I said the colored people of my district were content with their condition. I should have stated with a few exceptions, and I am sorry to say that these are what is known as "smarties" or "would-be" leaders. They are not the most sensible or well to do colored people. Whenever we find an industrious, sensible, thrifty colored man in my country he tells you that he wants no mixed schools; he wants no more excitement between the whites and his race; that he is content; that a few years ago he and his wife and children were chattels; were denied the right to learn to read, that they might learn of their creation and have at least some intelligent idea of the future. They were not citizens; could not testify against a white man; could not sit on juries; could not hold offices or vote. All these rights have been given him within ten years. Now shall they demand additional rights that will do their race no good and great harm, and may endanger some of the rights they now enjoy? This is the way our best colored people talk and feel, and this is the way, Mr. Speaker, they would talk and feel everywhere if they were not imposed upon by demagogues who want to use them for political purposes, and who have no regard or sympathy for them when they have served their purposes.

Sir, I have some feeling upon this subject; I have a right to this feeling. The colored people of my district met in convention on the 1st day of last May and indorsed my course in Congress, as they have done on many occasions, and I will not do an act or permit an act to be done that I believe before God and my country destroy the will schools for the colored children and the poor children of my race; for if the colored children are deprived of the benefits of the common schools, the same causes will deprive the poor white children.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that it is prejudice, and that if we pass the bill the whites and blacks will send their children to the same schools and all will go well. Suppose we grant that it is prejudice. Should we not legislate with a view to that prejudice? It is a great existing fact that we must meet, and meet it like men. To say that we can make laws, as if that fact did not exist, to benefit the race that the prejudice exists against, is a statement that I must dissent from.

Mr. Speaker, let us look into the bill and examine its provisions.

Let me say here that I sincerely doubt the right of Congress to pass such an act.

Sir, I have never been what is commonly known as a State-rights man as understood by the Southern States, but all must confess that States have some rights, and it is better for all that these rights be reserved to these States. While we preserve the rights that belong to the States we must not forget individual rights; they are far more important than State-rights. I will not attempt to discuss the constitutionality of the bill, even if I had time, as doubtless the law will be tested very soon after it shall have been executed or attempted to be executed, and as there seems to be such a diversity of opinion upon the question, nothing short of a judicial investigation will determine the same. I see nothing in the bill except the mixed-school feature but what the colored people are now entitled to and are enjoying under the Constitution and laws of the country. I might question the right of Congress to define who may be jurors in a State court, but as the State law of the State that I in part represent have made no distinction on account of race or color, I will not stop to discuss that proposition. Nevertheless it will strike many, even republicans, with much doubt, to say the least, of its constitutionality. I have always believed it was just and right for railroad companies if they charged a colored person first-class fare to give him and his wife and children as good accommodations as any one, and most of the railroad companies have provided cars equal to the best for the accommodations of the colored travelers and no one objects. The colored people do not want to be put in cars with the whites; that is not what they complain of; it was that they had to pay first-class fare and be put in second or third-class cars, mixed up often with drunken rowdies, smoking and using vulgar language in the presence of their wives and daughters. That is wrong, and no just man will say otherwise.

As to hotels, the laws regulate them much better than Congress can. The colored people do not want to eat and sleep with the whites; they want, if a hotel-keeper charges them as much as he charges the white guests, to have as good bed and as good diet, and that certainly is just and right. And I have heard of no complaint in my State. I find in traveling along the railroads that when the trains stop at the eating-houses a table is provided for the colored passengers, supplied with the same eatables and served by the same servants as the whites, and they all pay the same price, and both seem content. These things are well defined and understood by both white and black; they have become used to them, and no ill or bad feelings exist between them, and if the colored people were left alone and not tampered with by those who are not their friends, who only excite them and prejudice them against the whites, all would go on smoothly. In addition to a few white demagogues, there are a few colored men in my district who assume to be leaders of the colored race, and an occasional preacher who wants the whites and blacks to intermarry, and have no regard for our State laws on the subject of marriage, which laws were enacted for the benefit of both races, and all seemed satisfied with the law when it was promulgated as forever fixing the status of the white and colored marital relations in Tennessee, and as the law punished the whites for intermarrying with the blacks just the same as it did the blacks for intermarrying with the whites, neither race could complain. The law was tested in the Supreme Court of the United States; and that court held, as the law punished both alike, it was in strict conformity to the civil-rights bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, upon that condition of affairs the republican party have stood in my State. We have proclaimed to the world we were content. But, sir, when a few weeks since it was resolved in a convention at Nashville, the capital of my State, held by our colored people, that they were determined to have a different rule, and proposed to, and did as I now remember, raise a fund to bring a case to the Supreme Court of the United States and test the question whether a colored man could not take to himself a white woman for a wife and violate no law, and that the civil-rights law did override our State law, our whole people, regardless of party affiliations, were startled at the announcement, as it was a departure from all that had been said by the advocates of the colored people from the first step taken to advance and educate them up to the assembling of that convention.

Sir, if that doctrine had been proclaimed in 1865 the colored people in my State would have stood isolated and alone. The boldest white man of the bold would not have dared to advocate the doctrine of intermarriage of the blacks and the whites, and if that is the ultimatum of the colored race their best friends in Tennessee and several of the other Southern States must bid them adieu.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that said convention at Nashville spoke the sentiments of the colored people of my State. I cannot believe it. I have too much confidence in the good sense and judgment of our colored people. They cannot afford to take such a fatal step. They cannot, and in my opinion will not, place themselves and friends in the position of favoring such a suicidal policy.

The republican party gave to the colored people all the rights they enjoy. They were met at every step by those who were opposed to extending these privileges to them. The republican party believed it was due them that our great Government believed, as they had declared in the Declaration of Independence, that all men were born free and equal, and they felt that it was their duty to make good that declaration and place all the citizens upon the one grand, broad platform; and that was done by giving the colored man his oath, by making him a juror, by permitting him to sue and be sued, by giving him his vote in all elections and a right to be voted for, by providing him with good schools for his children and paying for them out of the common treasury. All these rights and immunities were cheerfully accorded to him by the republican party. While they were offered by many of our best citizens and thought not to be for the best interests of both races, they acquiesced in them and had almost ceased opposition and the two races were in harmony; and I am proud to say in my district there is no persecution of the colored race and all parties are anxious that no further agitation would be brought about upon the rights of the respective races. I certainly had hoped that we had crossed the Rubicon, that the excitement had subsided, and all was harmonious; but in that I find I was mistaken, that additional trouble at least for the colored people was about to be forced upon them by those who claimed to be their friends par excellence, but who I fear will prove their enemies.

Mr. Speaker, I think that our republican friends are mistaken in urging the passage of this bill. I accord to them honesty of intention, but mistaken judgment. But I do believe that some deference should be shown Representatives on this floor who certainly have better means of knowing the results of this law than those who live in localities where there are but very few colored people. Their stand-point is not as good as those who come from such districts as the one I represent; and while I do complain of the manner and language used by several gentlemen on the democratic side of the House toward the colored people, I think some of my side of the House have a little too much gall toward those who were in the rebellion. The time has come when bad feeling and exciting epithets should be heard and exhibited no more. Let us forget the past. It has no pleasant memories to either side. Lost friends, ruined fortunes, and blasted hopes, emaciated forms, broken constitutions, and divided families all tell of a fruitless effort to perpetuate human slavery in an age when the civilized world revolted at the idea.

O, let us forget the past and direct our thoughts to the present and great future, and look at our great national Commonwealth. Let us behold our great nation, with thirty-seven States and ten Territories and two of the Territories asking to be admitted to the sisterhood of States, and a busy prosperous population of forty millions, not only commanding the respect of the world but feared by all the nations of the earth, who not a century ago were the vassals of the mother-country. Let us love our country, and teach our children to love it for its greatness and its free institutions; a country, where the humblest of the humble, where the poorest of the poor, may aspire to be its Chief Magistrate or become its law-makers; a Government able to preserve its republican existence against foreign invasion or domestic insurrection, notorious for its magnanimous dealings with its domestic enemies, and not unmindful of its four millions of colored people who were but a few years since in bondage. O, then, let us be united upon all questions that will add to our country's goodness and greatness; let us not pass laws to divide and distract our people; let the colored people live in the land of their fathers; let them enjoy their rights as citizens; but let us also remember we have the two races; that we must legislate for both, that our legislation must be with a view to harmony, peace, fraternal feeling, and good will to all. Let these things characterize our legislation, and it will redound to the best interests both of white and black.

But, Mr. Speaker, it has been said that if I vote against the civil-rights bill that I will not be returned to Congress; that my colored friends will not sustain me. Sir, that has no terrors for me. I will do what I believe to be my duty, not only to the blacks but to the whites. I am not the representative of one race. I was chosen to represent the whole people of my district, regardlesss of race, color, or party affiliations. That duty I have and will perform. I may not perform it with satisfaction to all, but it shall be with fairness and independence. If my colored friends desert me, they desert a man who has stood by them in many hard-fought contests for the rights and privileges they now enjoy, and to-day I am pleading for them, and asking Congress not to inflict this great wrong upon them and upon the poor white people of any State. I am their best friend; if they desert me, where and to whom will they go? I do not believe they will do any such thing. They are as a class true and grateful, and while one here and there may be found to do so that wants to be a leader in the colored ranks, or some hypocritical preacher, the great mass of them will do as they have done, stand by me and show their gratitude toward one that desires their prosperity and the education of their little children. But if in this I am mistaken, and the colored man prefers a further agitation of the question of his rights, and prefers excitement, bad blood, and feeling, and is not satisfied with my vote on this question, then I will appeal to my own race to vindicate the rectitude of my course, trusting to time to convince all that what I may have done in the premises was not out of malice or hatred to any, but in the firm belief before God and my country that the happiness, peace, prosperity, and education of both races will be promoted and guaranteed by the course I have chosen. If in this I am mistaken, it is an error of judgment and not of intention.

Mr. Speaker, since I have been a member of this House, on all occasions I have endeavored to do my duty to the people who sent me here. I have done what I believed would redound to the best interests of my people. My political status never was doubted. I have always been true and firm to my principles and party. I never occupied a questionable position. My party always knew where I was politically. My opponents never had the least doubt of my opinions as expressed freely upon all occasions. I have never deserted a friend or pandered to an enemy. What I am is known by all. I am no dissembler or hypocrite, either in politics or religion; but let me say right here that no one of any political faith from my district or State ever called on me or sent me any business to attend to before Congress or the Departments that I did not give it immediate attention and for its accomplishment bring to bear whatever ability I possessed. Sir, I flatter myself, and invite the strictest scrutiny of the records of Congress, that no district in the South since the war has received from the Government more aid than the first district of Tennessee. I may have committed errors and have not succeeded in all that I desire for my district, but I did all I could. What I lacked in ability I endeavored to supply by fidelity and industry.

But, sir, my place is wanted, and in order to obtain it I must be gotten out of the way and the way opened to some who have no claims either upon the party or the people, nor can have, and to others who now enjoy place through my aid and influence, and the question is often asked, can it be so; and, if so, O, what base ingratitude! But, Mr. Speaker, I have confidence in the people of my district. I have never betrayed, never deserted them; some of them have known me from boyhood and in every relation of life, and it is those who always sustain me as a unit. In conclusion I will say, if I may not be regarded as egotistical, that if I have not accomplished much for my district, in the name of all that is sacred and dear, what could those who are now clamorous for my place accomplish in Congress for any people?

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at nine o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

There is no objection to it from any source, and it is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I ask its present consideration. We can get rid of it in a minute.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is it too late to object to the consideration of that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CLAYTON. I object.

Mr. OGLESBY. I appeal to the Senator from Arkansas. The bill has been read; and it will not take but half a minute to dispose of it, and then it will be out of the way.

Mr. CLAYTON. I want to examine it.

SETTLERS IN IOWA AND MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3575) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands in certain portions of the States of Minnesota and Iowa, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill. I am very sure there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that it shall be lawful for homestead and pre-emption settlers on the public lands in the counties of Cottonwood, Noble, Martin, Jackson, Watonwan, Murray, Rock, Lyon, Redwood, Brown, Chippewa, and Renville, in the State of Minnesota, and the counties of Iowa which compose the Sioux City land district, and counties contiguous to either of the above-exempted sections, where the crops of such settlers were destroyed or seriously injured by grasshoppers in the year 1873, and where such grasshoppers shall reappear in 1874 to the like destruction of the crops, to leave and be absent from their lands till May 1, 1875, under such regulations as to proof of the same as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe. During such absence no adverse rights are to attach to these lands, such settlers being allowed to resume and perfect their settlements as though no such absence had been enjoyed or allowed. The same exemption from continued residence is to be extended to those making settlements in 1874 and suffering the same destruction of crops as those making settlement of 1873 or any previous year.

Mr. WINDOM. A single word in explanation of the bill. During the last year a very small section in Northwestern Iowa, comprising the Sioux City district, and the counties named in Southwestern Minnesota have been ravaged by the grasshoppers and crops destroyed, and there is very great destitution in that section of the country. The only object of this bill is to enable the people who have had everything destroyed to leave their pre-emptions or homesteads until the 1st of May, 1875, in order to make a living, in order to support their families; and it provides that the absence shall not operate against their claims. There is nothing else in the bill.

The Legislature of Minnesota last winter appropriated $5,000 for their relief, and private subscriptions to the amount of $15,000 were raised, and $25,000 was also appropriated by the Legislature to buy seed for them this year, and the same infliction is likely to be suffered the present year. The bill can do no one any harm.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY B. BELFIELD'S HEIRS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3005) for the relief of the heirs of Mary B. Belfield, of Virginia, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides for paying $173.33 to the heirs of Mary B. Belfield, of Virginia.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 899) to indemnify the Pawnee Indians for forty-eight hundred acres of land; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 900) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of Ira Wilkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 901) for the relief of D. D. Snellgrove; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 902) for the relief of the legal representatives of Robert R. Davis, deceased, late a private in Company G, Second Regiment Arkansas Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 903) for the relief of James L. Laffery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 904) to provide revenue from the sale of public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 905) for the relief of M. V. Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, directed to consider and report upon the subject of the printing, publication, and distribution of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

HAYTIAN BRIG MARGARETTA.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations which I ask the Senate to take up. I think it will not occupy five minutes. It is Senate bill No. 535. I move to proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 535) for the relief of Robert Murray, jr., of the State of New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to Robert Murray, jr., of the State of New York, $1,378.75, being the amount paid by him as discriminating tonnage dues upon the Haytian brig Margaretta, in the years 1867 and 1868, in contravention of the treaty then existing between the United States and the republic of Hayti.

The Committee on Foreign Relations proposed to amend the bill by striking out in lines 4 and 5 the words "Robert Murray, jr., of the State of New York," and inserting "the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta, or their legal representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta, or their legal representatives."

THE NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. CRAGIN. I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 716) for the better government of the Navy of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 716) for the better government of the Navy of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section provides that hereafter any officer of the Navy who may be promoted in course to fill a vacancy in the next higher grade shall be entitled to the pay of the grade to which promoted from the date he takes rank therein, if it be subsequent to the vacancy he is appointed to fill; but the rank of all officers promoted below that of captain in the line and below the relative rank of commander in the staff shall not date anterior to the time when he shall have seen at least two years' sea service in the grade from which he shall be promoted.

Section 2 prohibits the accounting officers of the Treasury from making any allowance to any officer of the Navy who has been, or may hereafter be, dismissed from the service and restored to the same under the provisions of the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to amend the several acts heretofore passed to provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," to exceed more than pay as on leave for six months from the date of dismissal, unless it shall appear that the officer demanded in writing, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, and continued to demand as often as once in six months, a trial as provided for in that act.

Section 3 provides that cadet engineers shall be appointed annually by the Secretary of the Navy, and that the number appointed each year shall not exceed twenty-five.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with two amendments. The first amendment was to insert at the end of the first section:

But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive any officer of the precedence established by section 10 of an act approved March 3, 1871.

Mr. CRAGIN. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to withdraw that amendment and in lieu of it to move to strike out the proviso to the section in the following words:

Provided, That the rank of all officers promoted below that of captain in the line and below the relative rank of commander in the staff shall not date anterior to the time when he shall have seen at least two years' sea service in the grade from which he shall be promoted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported by the committee will be regarded as withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was to strike out the third section of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That so much of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to provide for the education of naval constructors and steam engineers, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, as provides that cadet engineers, not to exceed fifty in number, shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, is hereby repealed; and cadet engineers shall hereafter be appointed annually by the Secretary of the Navy, and the number appointed each year shall not exceed twenty-five; and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISABILITIES OF JOHN JULIUS GUTHERIE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 252.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 252) to remove the disabilities of John Julius Gutherie.

The bill proposes to remove all political disabilities imposed upon John Julius Gutherie, of North Carolina, by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by reason of his participation in the rebellion.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

FORFEITURE OF A LAND GRANT IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 154, which was under consideration yesterday.

Mr. SARGENT. While the Clerk is hunting for that bill, I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2019. It is a bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands to restore certain lands, heretofore granted to a railroad company, to the public domain.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2019) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad in the State of California.

The bill proposes to declare all lands which were granted by Congress in the year 1867 to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the city of Stockton to the town of Copperopolis, in the State of California, and which have not been patented by the United States to the company under the grant, which has expired by limitation, forfeited to the United States, and the lands are hereafter to be disposed of as other public lands of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I now ask the Senate to take up the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. After it is taken up I shall have no objection to giving way to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the resolution?

Mr. SARGENT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question is, Will the Senate proceed to consider the resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not feel at liberty to object to the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the resolution if the Senator wants to take it up; but I wish to be heard upon it when it is taken up.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I propose to take it up, subject to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is completed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I simply desire to have the resolution considered by the Senate and disposed of one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I simply desire to state how the sum named in the resolution came to be fixed. I desire a solution of this question, and I hope there will be no difficulty about it one way or the other, but that we shall do what is right. The Committee on Privileges and Elections originally reported a resolution just like the one reported in behalf of Mr. Abbott, of North Carolina, which I will read:

Resolved, That Joseph C. Abbott, late contestant for a seat in this body from the State of North Carolina, be allowed his salary from the 4th of March, 1871, up to the 23d day of April, 1872—

That was the day when the contest was finally determined—and one mileage each way.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections originally unanimously directed me to report a resolution in this case similar to the one reported in the case of Mr. Abbott; but it was ascertained that such a resolution could not be carried out, because in the mean time we had abolished all mileage, and therefore the Secretary of the Senate could not make the proper allowance under this resolution. Therefore I got the Secretary of the Senate to calculate what the pay of this gentleman would be from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the day on which the contest was decided.

Mr. CONKLING. At the rate of $7,500 a year?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I was about to state that. It is calculated from the 4th of March, 1873, until January or February last, whenever our increased pay ceased, at that rate, and since then according to the pay we are now receiving. So far as that increased pay is concerned, it is perfectly indifferent to me, and I know it is indifferent to the gentleman from Alabama. If it is the wish of the Senate that in this resolution we shall only comprehend the salary as it now is, I know he will be perfectly satisfied, and I suppose the committee will be satisfied. Some members have not received that increased compensation; others have; and probably it might be better in this instance that Mr. Sykes should receive what we all receive at this period of time. But as an original proposition I would offer nothing to the Senate nor would the committee but what the law in the case required according to the precedents heretofore established in this body. In all the contested-election cases before the Senate there is not one in which the principle has not been established that the contestant fairly before this body should receive the salary of a Senator from the time he was entitled to his seat, if it had been awarded to him, up to the time of the conclusion of the contest. If, however, it be the pleasure of the Senate to cut down the amount named in the resolution so that the pay shall be computed at the rate of $5,000 a year, so far as I am concerned I shall be perfectly satisfied. That will make it about $6,500.

Mr. CONKLING. This resolution is of importance enough to take the yeas and nays upon it I think. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it is not my fortune to know personally the claimant in whose behalf this resolution is offered. I need hardly disclaim, therefore, any hostility or ill-will to him in the objection I make. I know of no reason why Mr. Sykes, as much as any other citizen of the Republic standing in his place, should not receive the amount of money thus to be bestowed, but I object to the resolution on its merits. I object to it as wrong in law, wrong in reason, and an unjustifiable appropriation of public money. It proposes to pay to one who never was a Senator, who never was elected a Senator, and who the Senate has adjudged never was and never was elected a Senator, the same pay he would have received had he been elected a Senator and served till now. It proposes to pay one who never sat here an hour, who never discharged for one moment the duties of a Senator, the same sum of money received by those who during fifteen months have been Senators, acted as such, discharged their duties, and maintained themselves in Washington. I say this is unreasonable; unjust; unwarrantable.

How does the Senator from Maryland attempt to justify it? By an apology, by an apologetic reference to the fact that precedents can be found. Is it ever too early to put an end to bad precedents? Is it ever too early or too late to refuse to follow a bad example? Is it ever too late, whenever the question arises, to stop doing wrong? Pass this resolution, and another precedent will be established; and when the next case arises we need not go back into the past, we will find the precedent within the fresh new era, the era of reform on which we have entered: a precedent in these improved times might well estop us.

Mr. President, precedents have been abandoned by the Senate and by Congress in reference to matters of congressional compensation. The precedents are uniform authorizing the two Houses in increasing the salary of members and making the increase date back so as to give "back pay," as it has occasionally been called. We had such a precedent as late as 1866, when the House of Representatives raised the pay of members, provided that the increase should date back to the beginning of the term, and sent to the Senate an open bill. By "an open bill" I mean a bill in a stage open to amendment, not a bill reported by a conference committee as was the case in the last Congress, which must be voted upon entire, without the possibility of amendment. No such bill was sent to the Senate in 1866, but a bill in a stage permitting amendments. The Senate recorded itself not only in favor of the bill as a whole, but upon a motion leveled at the back-pay provision alone, the Senate adjudged that provision right and meritorious, and retained it. Every man received his pay, and his back pay, and at that time public sentiment acquiesced in the action of Congress. There is a precedent not yet nine years old, and behind it was a row of precedents. But when we came at the beginning of this session to consider a kindred, I might say a very similar question, did we stand on precedent? I might almost inquire did Congress dare to stand on precedent in the presence of the public frown which had darkly fallen on our legislation? No, sir. On the contrary, each House made haste to overrule and abhor precedents; each House experienced as a friend near me would say a new birth, and precedents were held utterly for naught. Now, when we come to one of the most egregious of all the examples of the past relating to this subject, my friend from Maryland (and he is a reformer I take it) rises and tells us we are to do this thing because it has been done before!

Mr. President, it has long been settled that a nuisance can never be prescribed for. By long use, I may establish the right, and the law presumes a grant, to pass and repass across the land of my friend, to burden it with servitudes, even to hold it forever in fee, and all this though I had in truth no grant at all; but for a nuisance I never can prescribe. No length of time for which it has been maintained will ever ripen into right or title, that which is costly to the public health or injurious to the public interest. No matter how hoary, a nuisance may and should always be abated. With equal reason, no contestant can prescribe for the privilege to be paid as if he had been elected and as if he had served.

I have heard it said that the claimant has been put to expense and therefore he should be paid his expenses. What expenses? He has employed counsel. Did not the sitting member from Alabama now in his seat employ counsel? Did not the Senate adjudge that he was entitled to the seat? And if the Senate is to pay counsel fees, is there any reason why the man who turned out to have no title should be paid and the man whose title the Senate has verified should be paid nothing? If in truth I be elected to a seat in the Senate, and I come as is my duty, take my seat, and address myself to my duties, and a contestant comes to challenge my title to my seat, and I am driven to employ professional aid to maintain my right, is there any more reason why the public money should reimburse him his counsel fees than why it should reimburse me; and more especially after the Senate has adjudged that the seat was mine, that it was not only my right but my duty to hold it?

It seems to me that a distinction in this regard in favor of the man who has no title, is capricious and sentimental, to say the least. I admit there may be reason for doing something. If a contestant comes in good faith to test his right, and we say his personal expenses shall be paid, our action might, without very much latitude, be defended. We might say the sitting member receives his salary for his expenses and his services as well—for his personal expenses; I mean in the sense of his maintenance. He is compelled to be here at all events and no additional cost is imposed on him in respect of his personal expense because his seat is contested. The contestant, however, comes on purpose to superintend the contest he makes. Therefore the whole of his personal expenses are incurred in the character of contestant. I could see some reason in such a rule, should it be established. If you extend it further and make it cover counsel fees, then I see not why the man whose title is valid and who is driven by another in spite of himself into a position in which he must incur expense in the employment of counsel, should be told, "This is your misfortune; you are, to be sure, the defendant in this proceeding; you were elected defendant not by yourself, but by another; he is the party who caused the expense; he forced it upon you; he required you to pay counsel fees; the tribunal has adjudged that your title was perfect and that he had no claim; and now we will pay him the expense he has incurred in the employment of counsel, but we deny you a shilling for the expense he imposed upon you."

What disordered logic, what wild injustice, will dare to justify such action?

I assume, then, that upon the merits the resolution cannot stand; and then we go back to the single fact that in the past such things have been done. I ask again, if we cannot stand and if we ought not to stand in respect of ourselves upon the precedents of the past, why should we select the most extraordinary and, if I may be allowed the expression, the most outlandish of all the precedents touching the pay of members and say because it is a precedent we will make obeisance to it? I say it is time to put an end to this abuse, and as often as we see an abuse so manifest we ought to lay our hands on it.

If the Senator from Maryland will propose that the actual personal expenses of this claimant be paid, to be fixed in any mode he pleases—and I should not be tenacious about that—be his expenses more or less, I mean his own expenses, excluding counsel fees and the like, I would vote for it, although I should have some doubt of its propriety. If he were to make his resolution so as to cover the counsel fees paid on both sides, I should reflect and consider; but I should need not a moment to decide that if we are to pay the contestant it would be at least as just to pay the man upon whom he forced a contest. When we are asked to pay to a man who has never rendered any service the whole meed given to those who have rendered the service, and to pay to a man whom we have adjudged never was elected Senator the same compensation which he would have received upon his being, and only upon his being, elected a Senator, it seems to me that there is no rule of law, reason, equity, or common sense which would call upon any man to take from his own upon such a principle; and when we come to the case of trustees, sitting as we do to administer trust moneys, not our own, and bound as we are by the rigorous exactions which the law imposes upon all trustees, I know not the principle upon which we are to be generous at the cost of being just. On the contrary I would draw the line exactly where justice draws it for all alike, and thus nobody will suffer in any sense for which we are to blame.

Mr. President, I see Senators impatient for the floor, and I will occupy but a single moment further, and that for the purpose of making this remark: I have had occasion for several years, as other Senators have had, to observe the workings in both Houses of the precedent to which we have been referred, and I say that it is unwholesome in my judgment to uphold a standing rule and invitation informing all candidates for Congress that they may come and contest a seat in the other House or in this, and when they end in defeat, they are just as lucky as in victory in all that touches pecuniary compensation. Take this claimant—I do not intimate that he did not come here in good faith—I do not intimate that it was not right for him to come and propose the question he did to the Senate—far from it, I make no such question. I discuss the case presuming it one in which he is not to be censured for making a contest; but nevertheless, no matter what the result may be, whether he succeeds or fails in the litigation, if I may so call it, he is equally successful in respect of dollars and cents. Is that wise or right? Is it wholesome? Is it well to hold out in every congressional district throughout the United States and to the Territories also—because if I am not mistaken one of the precedents is to be found in the case of a territorial Delegate—is it well to hold out to all the districts in forty-six States and Territories, that every man upon any ground he pleases may contest the seat of his competitor, and then the whole salary he would receive had he been entitled to it is to be paid to him from the public Treasury.

It seems to me this reason alone, dismissing entirely the question of the value of the money and the right or wrong of so disposing of it is enough to induce us to put an end to a bad practice and to let men understand hereafter that when they make unsuccessful contests all they can hope to receive is a sum of money indemnifying them against their personal expenses.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) This resolution is, as I understand, strictly according to all the precedents. I also believe that all the precedents are wrong. I entirely concur with the Senator from New York, that it is absurd to be governed in the sum which we are to pay in a case like this by what would be the salary of the man if he had been admitted to a seat as a Senator. This is a case, however, in which it cannot be said that the contest was made in bad faith. I was on the committee which had this matter referred to them. I was present at all their investigations. I was at all the meetings of the committee, heard the testimony, and heard the arguments, and I think it is entirely safe for me to say that the committee which reported in favor of seating Mr. SPENCER arrived at their conclusion upon grounds which they deemed reasonably satisfactory, but by no means free from doubt. The case was a complicated and difficult one; and if any one of the committee had been on the bench trying such a question in a court of law, it would not have been an easy question to decide. I think Mr. Sykes was not entitled to his seat, but I think the case one which was entirely proper to be investigated and settled by the action of the Senate.

I am disposed, therefore, to pay Mr. Sykes not merely his personal expenses, but a fair sum for counsel fees. I do not know whether he be a lawyer or not, but at all events he came here, and it was proper that he should retain counsel who appeared before the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does he see any reason, putting the case on the ground he does, why the man who was compelled by the other to employ counsel and to whom the seat was awarded, should not also be paid his counsel fees?

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well; let the Senator introduce a resolution to that effect and we will consider it.

Mr. CONKLING. But I ask my friend whether we can discriminate in favor of this gentleman on that question?

Mr. CARPENTER. I am not discussing that question. I have not thought of it. It is not before the Senate. If the Senator will introduce a resolution to pay Senator SPENCER his counsel fees, we will consider it, and I do not know but that I would vote for it; but we are now considering whether we shall make Mr. Sykes a payment or not; and I say we ought to pay him a fair indemnity for his expenses, a fair compensation for his time, and an indemnity for what he has paid to counsel. I think $3,000 would do that, and I move to amend this resolution by striking out the sum named in it and the words necessarily connected with that, and inserting the sum of $3,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution reported by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to allow us to finish this question. I think we shall have no trouble in coming to a conclusion upon it in a very short time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I must ask the Senate, with the assent of the Senator from Minnesota, to take up the bill relating to the publication and sale of public documents, which ought to be disposed of before the post-office appropriation bill is taken up. I gave notice that I should call it up, and although I am reluctant to interrupt this debate, it will evidently last all day, and the bill to which I have referred will not take more than half an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to laying aside the unfinished business informally. If the bill of the Senator from Rhode Island does not take more than half an hour or an hour, I should be glad to have it completed. I prefer to have the regular order laid aside informally instead of being postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the resolution reported by the Senator from Minnesota from the Select Committee on Transportation will be informally laid aside, and the bill indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island is before the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Before that bill is taken up, allow me to suggest a modification of the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reducing the sum named in it to $6,500. That will make it conform to the pay under the law before it was changed. And now if the Senator from Rhode Island will insist upon going on with his measure, I give notice that to-morrow, or Monday morning if we should adjourn over, I shall take occasion to call up this resolution again.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not in order to modify the resolution now, I take it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No; only by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Strictly it is not in order.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think it ought to be done, and the Senator need not suppose that I mean any discourtesy to him. I will make one more remark, if I may be permitted to do so. If this gentleman is to be paid the salary of a Senator, then he ought to be paid the salary fixed by law; and I submit to the Senator from Maryland that it is absurd to say we will pay him the salary, and then name a sum not fixed by law. Hereafter somebody may conclude to double it. Therefore, if we are going to follow the precedent, let us take it as the law fixed it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to say in connection with that matter, that $6,500, the amount now proposed, is about the pay which we are at present receiving, and we propose to fix it at that because a part of the Senate did not take the back pay.

Mr. CONKLING. But if the Senator will pardon me one moment, that is not the pay we were receiving at the time which this resolution covers, and we are paying him for that time and not for some other time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is the same pay that some of us did receive.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 857) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents, and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof, is before the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. The day before yesterday it was agreed, I believe, that the Military Committee should have part of to-day for the consideration of bills reported by them.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think this bill will take more than half an hour. I gave notice some time ago that I would call it up to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I know; but it was unanimously agreed that the Military Committee, who have had no call of bills this session, should have to-day after the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island is before the Senate; but the Senator from Illinois can move to postpone it, of course, and test the sense of the Senate by such a motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to postpone anything; but I supposed when a matter was made a special order——

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was not made a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that the business of the Military Committee was not made a special order in a technical sense. It was merely an understanding, which the Chair cannot enforce as such.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there was a unanimous understanding, I would not interfere; but I have had charge of this bill, and I have been trying for a long time to get it up and have it passed in time to send it to the other House.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no doubt that the bill referred to by the Senator from Rhode Island should be passed before we consider the post-office appropriation bill. On that bill there are amendments allowing certain documents to go through the mails free. I think the system recommended by the Committee on Printing, with some modifications, will receive the assent of both Houses; and if we have something to propose to the House in lieu of what they have inserted in the post-office appropriation bill, I think we can get a ready assent to a better system than the one which they propose. Therefore I very much hope that this bill may be disposed of by the Senate favorably before we launch into a discussion of the post-office appropriation bill, on which debate by order of the Senate is unlimited. The rule limiting debate on appropriation bills to five minutes does not apply to that bill; and I think we will save a good deal of time on the post-office appropriation bill as well as get a valuable measure, if we can consider before we reach that the bill from the Committee on Printing. I trust we may go on with it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to go on with this bill; but if there was a unanimous assent that the Senator from Illinois should have this time, and by reason of his being out of the Chamber momentarily when I called up my bill I have displaced him, I do not think it would be proper, or courteous, or senatorial for me to go on. I shall leave the question to him and he can decide it for himself.

Mr. LOGAN. How is that?

Mr. ANTHONY. I say I will leave it to the Senator from Illinois to say whether I shall go on or not. If there was a general understanding, as I infer from what he says, although I was not present, that he should have the time after one o'clock to-day, I do not wish to interfere with that understanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was an exception made in favor of the moiety bill, but I do not desire to antagonize the moiety bill to the bills of the Senator from Illinois, or the bills of the Senator from Minnesota, but I will ask that by general consent, so that there is no further delay about the moiety bill, it be made the special order for Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The understanding, as the Chair recollects it, was that the Senator from Illinois should proceed with his bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, subject to two things: first, appropriation bills; second, the moiety bill, or perhaps the order was reversed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing that the moiety bill shall be postponed for the present.

Mr. WINDOM. There was another condition stated at the time; whether it appears on the record or not, I do not know; but when the Senator from Ohio made an exception of the moiety bill I stated that I had no objection provided it did not displace the resolution which is before the Senate reported by the Select Committee on Transportation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not displace that resolution at all. That is the unfinished business.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to know further for what length of time this thing extends, whether it is for the entire day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The recollection of the Chair is that the Senator from Illinois thought two or three hours would be sufficient.

Mr. LOGAN. I will only say that I have tried several times to call up bills from the Committee on Military Affairs during the morning hour, as other bills from the different committees are usually passed, and I have never been enabled to do it except in one instance. Therefore I asked this order from the Senate, and the Senate agreed to it unanimously; but inasmuch as there are other Senators who have business that is much more important than this, I will yield and let them go on with it.

Mr. WINDOM. I am very much obliged to the gentleman so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island is before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have stated that although I am desirous of going on with this bill, if there was a general understanding, in my absence, that the Senator from Illinois should have his bills taken up now, I would not interfere with it. I do not think it would be fair to do so. The Senator spoke as if he had some feeling about it. Certainly he should have no feeling against me. I called up this bill according to previous notice, without any knowledge that the day had been assigned to him. If he says the day has been assigned to him by general consent, I am the last man in this body to interfere with such an arrangement.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very much mistaken if he thinks I have any feeling about this matter. I am only surprised that Senators should think a Senator has feeling if he is disappointed. It is not the case at all. I have never tried to press any business of my committee in opposition to any other business, and do not desire to do so. The Senator from Minnesota said that an exception was made in reference to his resolution. The President of the Senate decided that that resolution was the unfinished business and would naturally come up. That would cut me out of course. I then said that I yielded to other business that was more important, presuming it was more important or else Senators would not insist on it. That is what I said, and without any ill-temper at all or having any feeling about it. The decision of the Chair was that the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota was the unfinished business. Of course I could not interfere with that, and hence I yielded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The printing bill is before the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I ask permission at this time to make a report from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, to report it back with amendments.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to ask the Senator when he proposes to call that bill up.

Mr. WEST. I give notice to the Senate that in the event of the lapse of any business between now and Monday next at one o'clock I shall call this bill up. If I do not have the opportunity before that, I shall call it up on Monday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3095) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. W. S. HERNDON of Texas, Mr. JACKSON ORR of Iowa, and Mr. N. B. BRADLEY of Michigan, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3601) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3602) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas T. Fauntleroy and Charles H. Williamson, citizens of Virginia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 3574) explanatory of the act of June 18, 1864;

A bill (H. R. No. 3007) granting a pension to Cordelia Wilcox;

A bill (H. R. No. 3009) granting a pension to Michael Bannon, of Dayton, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 3011) granting a pension to Mrs. Letitia Carr;

A bill (H. R. No. 3012) granting a pension to John Heddinger;

A bill (H. R. No. 3014) to place the name of Mrs. Caroline Duncan on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. No. 3019) granting a pension to George H. Reynolds; and

A bill (H R. No. 3160) in reference to the operations of the shipping commissioners act, approved June 7, 1872.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of and to protect certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The message also announced that the President had on the 3d instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 510) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, and other associations for monumental purposes;

An act (S. No. 477) granting a pension to Jemima Maxwell;

An act (S. No. 540) granting a pension to Fanny Newcomb, mother of Irenus Newcomb, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment Vermont Volunteers;

An act (S. No. 568) granting a pension to Hugh P. Lytle, late a private in Company H, Thirty-second Ohio Volunteers;

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 857) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents, and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the bill in section 4, line 2, by inserting after the words "two hundred" the words "and twenty-one;" so as to read:

That there shall be printed and bound in leather one thousand two hundred and twenty-one complete sets of the journals, the reports, and the documents printed by order of Congress, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 4, lines 11 and 17, I wish to alter the language of the amendments already put in, so that they will read: "One set to the Official Reporter's office of the Senate" and "one set to the Official Reporter's office of the House," so that the language will be the same in both case.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 6, line 9, I move to insert the words "one copy" after the amendment already made in that line; so as to read:

To each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress, one copy.

The words "one copy" were left out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 17, line 21, the word "copy" should be inserted for "set."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 4, line 50, I propose to modify the amendment made in that clause, so as to make it read:

One set to the executive of each State, for the use of the State, in exchange for a complete annual set of its executive and legislative documents sent to the Library of Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thought you struck that out.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have altered it. I have struck out the obligatory part. I will explain this to Senators who feel an interest in it. The original bill gives a set of these documents to the executive of each State which shall in return send to the Library of Congress a set of its executive and legislative documents. That was stricken out, because it did not seem proper to impose a duty of that sort on a State; but the Librarian says he has great difficulty in getting these documents, and he would like to have a recognition in the bill of some expectation on the part of Congress of receiving them, so that he may get them in exchange. Therefore I propose to make it read:

One set to the executive of each State, for the use of the State, in exchange for a complete annual set of its executive and legislative documents sent to the Library of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 5, line 12, the word "Librarian" should be "Library," and "two" should be stricken out and "fourteen" inserted in the same line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 6, line 13, I move to strike out "six" and insert "fourteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 12, line 4, I move to strike out the words "for distribution by" and to insert "for the use of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 13, line 5, the same amendment should be made, striking out the words "for distribution by" and inserting "for the use of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 14, lines 3 and 4, the same amendment should be made, striking out the words "for distribution by" and inserting "for the use of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I now move to strike out section 19, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the provisions of this act relating to the printing of congressional journals, documents, bills, and reports, shall not apply to those which have been or may be ordered to be printed by the first session of the Forty-third Congress, but shall thenceforth take effect, and all laws and parts of laws, joint resolutions and parts of joint resolutions, conflicting with the provisions of this act, except so far as they may relate to the printing of the documents of the first session of the Forty-third Congress, be, and they are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 4, line 79, after the words "Department of Justice," I move to strike out "five sets for the use of the Department" and insert "fourteen sets, of which nine shall be for the Chief Justice and justices of the Supreme Court."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. These are all the amendments except one, which I delay because the Senator from Ohio proposes to move an amendment, as I understand—he gave notice that he would—which, if it should be adopted, would render this inappropriate. I will explain now the general purpose and plan of this bill very briefly indeed, and then if any Senators have inquiries to make about it, and I am able to answer them, I will do so.

The bill has two purposes. The first arises naturally out of the abolition of the franking privilege, the natural consequence of which is the discontinuance of the popular distribution of public documents, and that as naturally requires some new system, some plan of sale, as has long been the practice in England. The law already allows any person to purchase public documents by sending the cost of the same in advance to the Congressional Printer; but men are not likely to buy books that they have not seen; and after a book has been published it is too late to comply with the requirement of the law, which is that the money must be paid in advance. Moreover, people are still less likely to buy books when they can get them gratuitously, as they have been able heretofore to get all the public documents we have printed.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to ask a question. As I understand the bill, it does not regulate the printing by the Departments except of certain official reports.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will come to that presently.

Mr. SARGENT. The abuse has not been in extravagant printing and binding of congressional documents; it has been in the fanciful books that have been got up on the order of the Departments, and I believe this bill does not reach that difficulty. It may be that the Senator proposes in some other form to do that, but this only relates to the congressional printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what I am speaking of now. I will come to the point as to which the Senator inquires presently. We have provided in this bill that a number of documents, to be determined by the Joint Committee on Printing, shall be printed for sale in addition to the number ordered by Congress; that they shall be sold at the cost to the Government for producing them after the regular Government edition has been printed; that is, the mere cost of paper and press-work, the type which is set for the original edition answering for the additional copies. The first and second sections contain the provisions to this effect.

The second purpose of the bill is to rearrange and reform, to codify the statutes, the customs, and the traditions for the official distribution of documents. These laws are scattered through the statute-books from the second volume to the last, and many of them are founded upon no law, but seem to have arisen out of temporary instructions and verbal orders which have hardened into precedent and custom. The distribution is exceedingly irregular and capricious, and founded upon no general principle. For instance, in the distribution of documents to the Treasury Department, the First Comptroller has two sets of all documents, the Second Comptroller has four. I know of no reason for this difference. The Paymaster-General of the Army has two; the Commissioner of Customs has three; the Light-House Board two, and so on. The unbound documents, the stitched documents, and the bills are distributed with the same capricious irregularity. Doubtless many of these Bureaus require more than the number allotted to them of certain documents, and require none at all of others. Therefore the bill provides that these documents shall be distributed in bulk to the heads of Departments and by them redistributed to the different Bureaus, as the prayer-book says, "according to their several necessities."

Mr. SARGENT. According to the new political prayer-book, "where they will do the most good." [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. We printed a document the other day that the Light-House Board would probably want three-fourths of all that are distributed to the Departments.

There has also been a distribution, irregular, to the foreign legations here, and that has been continued from time to time until the distribution embraces some legations that have been abolished: the legation of Bremen; the legation of Sardinia, which country has now become a part of the kingdom of Italy; and one of the South American legations that has not been represented here for some time. A set also goes to the legation of Switzerland, though Switzerland has no diplomatic representative here. She is represented only by a consul. The committee have recommended that a certain number, thirty, be furnished to the State Department for the use of the Department, for the use of foreign legations here, and for diplomatic and consular distribution abroad; the same number to the Treasury Department to be distributed among the Bureaus; to the War Department, twelve; to the Navy Department, fifteen; to the Post-Office Department, fifteen; to the Department of Justice fourteen, including the supply to the justices of the Supreme Court.

There has been also heretofore a considerable distribution of documents to committee-rooms. Every committee-room receives a complete set of what we call the reserved documents. In the constant changes of the committee-rooms these are not preserved; they are not arranged; and now we have a Senate library which is made up almost entirely of documents, and instead of sending a full set to every committee-room the bill proposes to send a sufficient number to the library where they can be sent for by any committee that requires them. There they will bear the stamp of the library; there is an officer appointed to take care of them, and see that they get back after they are sent out. It is easier now for a Senator to send to the library for a document than it is to hunt it up on the shelves of the committee-rooms. There may be a necessity for some alteration in this part of the bill developed by the working of it. The Journals of the House and the Senate, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the Statutes should be in every committee-room, and each committee will need some documents that other committees do not want. The Naval Committee might want certain documents, the Committee on Military Affairs certain others, and the Post-Office Committee certain others. Any defects of that kind can be easily remedied, perhaps without further intervention of law.

The Statutes at Large are to be distributed as they were before and so are the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court. The Biennial Register is to be distributed as it has been for the last two publications which are a little larger than the former ones, which increase has been made necessary by the increase in the officers of the Government to whom it is sent. My own judgment is that the Biennial Register is not a necessary publication, but I have twice proposed to abolish it here and the sense of the Senate has been the other way; and so I do not attempt to abolish it in this bill.

The Secretary of the Interior has charge, under the bill as now, of all the documents for distribution among the States, and the documents for distribution on the order of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, one set to each member, to be given to such institution as he may designate. That distribution is still continued in the same hands.

Section 11 gives the Secretary of State the same authority he has now of publishing certain documents relating to foreign affairs. It is sometimes very desirable that our documents relating to foreign affairs shall be distributed abroad. The discretion has been exercised very judiciously always, and it is the opinion of the Department that this distribution ought not to be taken away. This is not in any sense for popular distribution and the number is reduced. At one time it was very large; it is now made fifteen hundred, with permission to add five hundred if that be desirable.

The next section provides for the publication of small numbers of their own reports to be furnished to three of the Bureaus—those of Indian Affairs, the General Land Office, and the Statistical Bureau. It is three thousand of the report of the commerce and navigation, and two thousand of the others. This, as in the case of the State Department documents, is in no sense a popular distribution. The heads of these Bureaus are constantly applied to for information which they ought to furnish, information which officials require and which citizens have a right to ask. They can send that much better through these reports than by writing answers, employing clerks, and spending time in hunting up the information required. I have no doubt that this publication of two thousand copies for distribution by the heads of these Bureaus is an economical thing; that it saves clerk hire, secures accuracy, and supplies more accurate information than could otherwise be furnished.

As to the Agricultural Report the bill provides for a larger publication, and I will ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture on that subject which explains the ground on which we have put in twenty-five thousand copies of that report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, March 3, 1874.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I am prompted by the necessities of this department to ask that Congress shall order twenty-five thousand copies of its annual report to be published for its use. This is the only reliable point in the United States where the statistics of agriculture are collected and so periodically published as to prevent speculative imposition upon the planters and farmers of the country. This information is given by agents of the department, whose only compensation is the annual reports as published and seeds sent to them. It is their business to make and report the comparative as well as the present condition and result of crops. They have no means of doing this but by reference to the preceding reports, and these I have not to give them. It is but just, too, that they should be furnished with a copy of that which is in a great measure the work of their own hands. The demand for this publication by all the public libraries and societies at home and abroad is daily made upon us on the ground that such exchanges enlighten the people; and this department is derelict in failing to respond.

The annual report of 1872 has been already stereotyped, and it will cost no more than the expense of paper and press-work to publish it. That of 1873 has for some time been upon my table ready for the press. I deem it exceedingly important that at least the report of 1872 should be printed for the purposes indicated.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

FREDK. WATTS, Commissioner.

Mr. SARGENT. I beg to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the letter really does not explain why twenty-five thousand copies should be put in his hands for distribution. If the bill is as the Senator states, the provision that the report may be purchased at the cost of printing, paper, binding, and postage, applies to this book as well as to others. Now, why public libraries and other institutions should have it free through the Agricultural Department and the rest of the people should buy it, I do not see; and why some individuals should have it free while others buy it, I do not see. Why is the large amount of twenty-five thousand to be distributed free? Why not let this report come under the general law? If you gave the Commissioner five thousand from which he shall send copies to his correspondents, men who furnish him valuable information, to stimulate them to do that and continue it, I could see some propriety in it; or if it requires ten thousand to do that, I would so vote; but why we should send this report free to public libraries or anybody else except those who render the department service, who assist it in making up the report, I do not see. In other words, twenty-five thousand is either too large or entirely too small. Either the whole edition should be free, which would be two or three or four hundred thousand to supply the wants of the country, or twenty-five thousand going upon some system of free distribution is too many. Either the whole should be free, or less than twenty-five thousand should be free; that is to say, five or six or ten thousand, probably five thousand, to answer the calls of his correspondents who furnish matter to the Commissioner which he works up and puts in his report. I understand that there are scattered all through the agricultural States, probably in every State in the Union, persons who are his correspondents, who furnish him information from time to time, regular correspondents of whom he keeps lists, who are useful to him. I should be perfectly willing that he either as a matter of compliment or compensation should send them one or more copies of this book; but when you get outside of that, the free distribution should cease and this report should come under the English system.

Mr. ANTHONY. The question is where the limit is. The Commissioner of Agriculture puts it at twenty-five thousand.

Mr. SARGENT. No; he speaks about the usefulness of the report, how much it is sought for.

Mr. ANTHONY. But in the letter just read——

Mr. SARGENT. The letter does not reach that point, I think.

Mr. ANTHONY. The letter states the purpose for which he wants these volumes and then states the number that he wants. The inference is pretty clear that that is the number which he thinks is desirable, and I know he does think so.

Mr. SARGENT. This letter was written two months ago and probably not in view of this bill. It was to urge on the Committee on Printing the necessity of printing the Agricultural Report and putting twenty-five thousand copies at the disposal of the Commissioner for free distribution; but in view of the provisions of this bill the letter is entirely too liberal.

Mr. ANTHONY. The letter was written two months ago and it has not grown very old.

Mr. SARGENT. The bill was reported May 26, and the letter is dated March 3, and of course they have no relation to each other. If the Senator will observe, the letter goes on to speak about the value of the statistics contained in the volume.

Mr. ANTHONY. The letter is of an earlier date than the report of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. He speaks of the necessity of ordering it to be printed, stating that he has another volume that has not been ordered to be printed at all, and which also ought to be printed. That is a general argument in which I entirely agree with him; but coming down to the question of distribution, there is nothing in the letter to show that this case is exceptional, and probably five thousand would cover everything that he needs for distribution to his agents; and everybody else ought to pay for the volume.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from New Jersey is better informed on this subject than some of the rest of us are, and I will appeal to him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can say to the Senator from California that the Commissioner of Agriculture has informed me that the distribution of this report is about the only compensation that he can make to those who send very valuable information from all parts of the United States, which is here aggregated and forms the next report.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator say or the Commissioner say that there are twenty-five thousand of those people?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is my impression. I do not remember the exact number.

Mr. SARGENT. I think I can show the Senator his impression is an entire mistake. I think in my State there are but thirty of these persons. The Senator knows how many States there are in the Union, and there are probably three times as many in the largest States as in my own.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know how that is.

Mr. SARGENT. Any calculation must come far below the amount I propose for free distribution—five thousand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know as to the number of volunteers that is necessary for that purpose, but I should think a very much larger number than thirty for a State. My own knowledge extends further than that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Passing by that at present, the Senator from California will move an amendment, if he sees fit, after I have concluded. I propose—I have not put it into the bill because I am awaiting the fate of the proposition which the Senator from Ohio said he intended to make—to add two thousand copies of the report of the Signal Office, which I think is very small in number, and I have a letter from the Signal Office of a similar character to that of the Commissioner of Agriculture, that he cannot carry on his operations without a large correspondence, and he has no mode of paying the correspondents except by his report.

The Smithsonian Institution report stands upon a different basis from that of any of the Bureaus. The number that is provided for the Smithsonian Institution is somewhat less than the number that has formerly been printed for the Institution and for distribution by the two Houses of Congress. As was explained the other day by the Senator from Maine, who is one of the regents of the institution, [Mr. HAMLIN,] this distribution comes back to us largely in books for the Congressional Library. It is a very excellent distribution, and a large portion of it goes abroad to the credit of American science and comes back to us in books of a similar character from other countries. Besides, we should be bound to do this, for the Smithsonian Institution is a great donation made to us by a liberal and enlightened foreigner for the "diffusion of knowledge among men." That was the broad, liberal, generous character of the gift; the only condition he put on it was that it should be used for the "diffusion of knowledge among men;" and certainly it would be a very shabby thing for us to take all the advantage of this great donation, which is under the charge of a man who ranks among the very highest scientific men living in this country or that has ever lived among us—it would be a very shabby thing for us not to publish its reports, to make known to the world what we have done with this large donation.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my friend allow me to supplement a single word there which he omits?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. In addition to what he has so well said, Congress has imposed certain duties upon that institution which it discharges and at a very great relief in expense to the Government. Its cabinet of natural history and a variety of other things were transferred to that institution, and it takes care of them, takes charge of them at a mere pittance of what it cost the Government to do so; and so of some other things. The Government therefore in an account-current is indebted to the institution to-day in dollars and cents.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think no one would wish to diminish the distribution of the reports of that institution.

This bill proposes to reduce the number of reserved documents bound in leather from 2,000 to 1,221. It reduces the distribution of the Senate bills from 905 to 670 and the House bills from 916 to 680, and I think makes a much better distribution at a considerable saving to the Government.

The bill has been prepared with a great deal of care; it has been a very vexatious affair to those of us who are on the Committee on Printing. I dare say it contains many errors which can only be discovered by the test of experiment. We have consulted with the heads of Departments and with the heads of Bureaus, all of whom have been anxious to co-operate in the interests of economy, and the Secretary of State has very kindly opened a correspondence with some of the foreign legations, and we have derived valuable information as to the mode of officially distributing public documents from General Schenck, and from Mr. Washburne, and from Mr. Bancroft. The committee have been particularly indebted to Captain C. C. Adams, the superintendent of the document-room in the Interior Department, who has given great attention to this subject, and a considerable portion of the bill is of his own codification.

Mr. SARGENT. I move in section 14, line 2, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "ten," so as to provide for ten thousand copies of the Agricultural Report. I insert that number in deference to the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey, who seems to think that five thousand will not be enough. Following my own judgment I should say five thousand would be sufficient.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senator from California will delay that motion. I have sent for the Commissioner of Agriculture, so that I may be able to get some information on the subject.

Mr. SARGENT. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer three or four amendments to this bill to carry out the logic of the bill. I am decidedly in favor of the general principle on which this bill is framed. The trouble is that my friend from Rhode Island stopped short when he reached the Departments, and has actually continued in the Departments a greater abuse than ever existed as to the franking privilege of members of Congress in my judgment.

It will be remembered that under the present law the Departments send out, nominally on the payment of postage but really at the expense of the United States and free to the recipients, any documents they choose to distribute. They receive stamps for an indefinite amount and place them upon the books that are sent out, and those stamps are paid for in money out of the Treasury of the United States, so that they have the franking privilege in its most offensive form.

Section 10, section 11, section 12, section 13, and section 14 continue and enlarge this abuse of the franking privilege to several Departments as to several important documents, and section 5 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to purchase at the public expense and distribute free of charge twelve thousand copies of the laws of the United States, about enough to supply all the lawyers who may want them, I suppose. It seems to me that these sections ought not to be a part of this bill. If documents are to be paid for by the people they ought to be paid for by everybody alike, and the Departments ought not to have the privilege of sending out documents free of charge to their favored few or to their favored many, while everybody else has to pay. My constituent may write to me for one of these public documents, and I cannot send it to him unless I first pay the postage and then pay the cost of the document, under this bill. That is perfectly right. Let them all stand on the same footing. If they want a copy of the laws of the United States, they should send for it and pay for it. If they want a Biennial Register or (which is more frequently the case) a Post-Office Directory, they send here fifty cents or whatever sum may be required and pay for it and receive it. But this bill authorizes the heads of Departments and even the heads of Bureaus to distribute a large number of documents at the public expense. The printing is at the public expense; the postage is at the public expense; and all these documents go free to whomsoever may be selected by these various Departments to receive them. That contains all the worst features of the franking privilege, with this difference: that when the documents were distributed in the old-fashioned way among Senators and Members, that secured at least a fair distribution throughout the country, while by these Departments you do not secure a fair distribution—far from it. The documents will be sent to particular localities and distributed by a few men instead of by many, so that these sections are subject to all the abuses of the old franking privilege.

Let us take them up in their order and I will move to strike them out in their order. Take the fifth section of the bill:

That at the close of every session of Congress the Secretary of the Interior shall purchase eleven thousand pamphlet copies of the acts and resolves of Congress for that session.

I ask if they are to be printed at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. ANTHONY. The statute laws have been printed under contract with Little, Brown & Co. They can be printed at the Government Printing Office as well as anywhere.

Mr. SHERMAN. It makes no difference to my argument either way. The Government of the United States undertakes to buy at the public expense eleven thousand copies of the laws of the United States. If they are published under private contract with Little & Brown, as a matter of course we pay the money for them. What the cost is I do not know. But as they are printed in the very best possible manner, and at the end of a Congress they are bound handsomely, those that are bound in calf undoubtedly would cost five or six dollars a volume, and those that are not bound in that way, on account of the superiority of the paper and the mode they are gotten up, would be undoubtedly very expensive pamphlet copies. We are to buy eleven thousand of those and they are to be distributed through the mails free.

It is true that certain officers are named who shall receive a certain number of them; but the officers named would probably engross only about twelve hundred copies, the number that is to be distributed of the regular documents; and to that extent there is no objection to it; that is to say, each Senator ought to be furnished with one copy, the President with one or two, each member of the House with one; and to the extent that the laws are to be distributed like other public documents the section is right, but twelve hundred copies will go to every officer of the Government, and that leaves still nearly ten thousand copies for free distribution.

What sense is there in distributing the laws of the United States to lawyers free of expense? They are certainly able and willing to buy them. Why give to the Secretary of the Interior this large number of volumes to distribute free of expense, the postage to be paid by the Government of the United States? That is the franking privilege in its worst form. It seems to me that section ought to be modified, and instead of eleven thousand, the number provided for ought to be only twelve hundred, the same number that is provided as to ordinary public documents, and they should be distributed to particular individuals designated by the law, precisely as other documents are distributed under the fourth section of the bill. But under the fifth section here is an expense of at least from ten to twenty thousand dollars a year, and probably more than that including the postage, for free matter sent to a favored few. I trust the Senator from Rhode Island will modify the fifth section so as to confine this distribution, instead of eleven thousand, to twelve hundred, and then let the laws be distributed just like other public documents.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator does not apprehend, I think, the intention of this section. This is the same distribution which has long prevailed, and which the Secretary of the Interior finds necessary in order to place the laws within the reach of those who are bound to administer them. They must be sent to the officers of the Army and Navy. They must have the laws of Congress. They must be sent to the customs officers; they must be to the internal-revenue officers, to the land officers, to the surveyors' offices, to the offices under the Indian Bureau. They must all have the laws. You cannot take the laws that relate to one particular department of the public service and make a compilation of them and send that to the officers appointed to administer that service.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to answer the Senator before he proceeds further. He undertakes here to define how many are necessary for the different Departments. He gives to the Department of Agriculture ten copies. I consider that a very liberal allowance for a department that has not anything to do with law.

Mr. ANTHONY. Every Department has to do with law.

Mr. SHERMAN. He gives to the Government Printing Office two copies; that is not excessive; to the governor and secretary of each of the Territories one copy each, and then to the Secretary of the Interior, to be retained in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior, one thousand copies, and the remainder to be distributed to the States and Territories in proportion to the number of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress to which they are at the time entitled. Here is a distribution to States and Territories. If anybody in any State or Territory wants the laws of the United States, why should he not buy them? They are published not only at the Government Printing Office, but by Little & Brown as a speculation and sold by them, and every lawyer should buy them who needs them.

This section provides for the Post-Office Department fifty copies, and for the Department of Justice and the judges four hundred and twenty-five copies. That is more than is necessary. There are only sixty district courts in the United States, and probably one hundred would reach every judicial officer in the United States, and really there is no reason why a marshal or a district attorney should not buy his own law-books. A district attorney must have the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States. They are just as necessary for him as the Statutes. The decisions of the Supreme Court are distributed to a certain limited extent.

Mr. ANTHONY. About three hundred and fifty copies.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me this distribution ought to be stricken out, and only so many provided for as are necessary to furnish the judges and the officers who should be provided for. I would not give them either to district attorneys or marshals, and certainly not for distribution among States and Territories. We distribute arms among the militia of the States and Territories; but this thing of distributing the laws at the public expense I think is totally unnecessary.

There is another abuse here that I think the Senator from Rhode Island ought to correct:

SEC. 10, That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind such additional numbers of the annual reports of the Executive Departments, with such selections from the documents accompanying them as may be desired, as the heads of those Departments may respectively order.

Here is an unlimited authority without restraint——

Mr. ANTHONY. Please read all of the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know you require them to charge it to their appropriations; and that is all. Here is a clause giving every head of Department the authority to print any such additional numbers of the annual reports of the Executive Department, not only of one Department but of all the Departments. Under this the Secretary of War may order all the documents of all the Departments. I will read it again:

That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind such additional numbers of the annual reports of the Executive Departments—

Including a mass of five or six volumes usually at each session—with such selections from the documents accompanying them as may be desired, as the heads of those Departments may respectively order; and also such copies of the separate reports of heads of Bureaus and other subordinate offices as the heads of their respective Departments may order: Provided, That the cost of printing and binding such additional numbers of the report of any head of Bureau or other subordinate officer of a Department be charged to the printing account of that Bureau or Department office.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now the Senator will allow me to say that is the existing law; and there is a perfect control over it in the Committee on Appropriations. The head of a Department says he wants so much appropriated for printing, and that committee acts on his estimates.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that. The Senator says that the check is that they cannot exceed their appropriations. But what is the actual fact without going into the possibilities? Do we not know that the heads of Departments and even the heads of Bureaus publish documents of a most expensive character? They make an ordinary annual official report, a document that is generally burned at the end of six months, or got rid of in the easiest possible way, and which only lasts during one year at the most, the most ephemeral document in the world. They print such documents in the most elegant style, with expensive binding, for distribution among Senators and others. That is an abuse which ought to be corrected. No document ought to be ordered to be printed except those documents necessary for the current business of the Departments and Bureaus.

Mr. ANTHONY. Who shall judge?

Mr. SHERMAN. You must limit them.

Mr. ANTHONY. Shall we judge here whether the Secretary of State shall order printing needed in his Department?

Mr. SHERMAN. Shall you authorize the head of a Department to do what the Senate itself cannot do? This law is for the purpose of taking away from the Senate of the United States the power of ordering the printing and distribution of extra numbers of public documents, and yet you place it in the head of every Department, and practically in the head of every Bureau, to order an unlimited amount, without restraint, of all executive documents.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, Mr. President, not an unlimited amount. The appropriation entirely controls the expenditure, and it is in the power of the Committee on Appropriations to require the appropriations to be itemized as much as they see fit. They can give to the Secretary of State so many dollars for printing the directory of the Department, so many for printing passports, so many for printing other species of document or paper that he requires.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will give way for a moment to my friend from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, on that aspect of the case.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think my friend from Rhode Island is mistaken about the power of the Committee on Appropriations to control this mischief, if it be one. These officers have the authority of law. The heads of the Departments are authorized to order the printing of their own reports and of the reports of the heads of Bureaus and all their subordinate officers. Practically, it is the order of the Bureaus, and the head of the Department takes very little interest in it. I understand the practice about these documents has been changed substantially and radically within a few years. Formerly the reports of the heads of Bureaus were printed by order of Congress and not otherwise; but now they are printed at any time when a book is ready to be launched on the public by a Bureau without any regard to Congress whatever. The head of the Bureau gets up just such a book as he chooses and has it printed and printed in his own style. The Senator shakes his head; but that is my observation in regard to it, for I went to the Congressional Printer at the beginning of the session and took especial pains to inquire and I was shown specimens of most elegant binding and most elegant work on various books, and they were got up as well as such work could be done anywhere in this country, and I was told that the price of that binding was at least three dollars a volume.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did not the contents of the document warrant such binding?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In the estimation of the head of the Bureau it did, but in public estimation it would not amount to anything. There might have been a precious morsel of science or art underlying that, which some appreciative soul might get at; but so far as I was concerned it was all blank to me. I do not propose to criticise the work on the merits of the work; but the fact is undoubtedly as I state it, that the heads of Bureaus, who are naturally ambitious to rear monuments of their learning and skill and art, &c., and to put them into handsome binding, do get up these extra works and they do swell the printing of Congress, for it all goes out as the printing of Congress. Two or three millions Congress spends for printing, and that is the way most of the money is spent.

I do not mean to give the impression to the Senate that it is a usual practice to bind books so expensively as that class of books which I have described, for I believe it was said that there was only a limited number of copies of that extra, exquisite workmanship, which were complimentary, which were matters of compliment by the head of the Bureau to give to some of his friends; but it is undoubtedly true that it is an extraordinary abuse and ought to be corrected. I think of nothing more likely to effect it than an amendment which I will propose to the tenth section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have moved to strike out that section.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Suppose I amend it not only to cure this difficulty, but to correct the law under which this abuse exists. Say in section 10 "that hereafter," and then strike out "it shall be the duty," so as to read "that hereafter the Congressional Printer;" and then strike out all the words after "Departments," down to and including "order," in line 6; so that the first clause of the section will read:

That hereafter the Congressional Printer shall print and bind the annual reports of the Executive Departments upon the order of the heads of those Departments respectively.

And then, as to the last clause, strike out the latter part and insert:

But the reports of heads of Bureaus and the subordinate officers shall be printed only on the order of Congress.

Then the whole section would read thus:

That hereafter the Congressional Printer shall print the annual reports of the Executive Departments upon the order of the heads of those Departments respectively; but reports of heads of Bureaus and the subordinate officers shall be printed only upon the order of Congress.

The effect of that would be to change the whole system of printing, to be sure, but it would give the heads of Departments the authority to print their annual reports which are necessary to be sent to Congress, and they would send them to Congress with the accompanying reports of the subordinates, and necessarily they would go to the Committee on Printing, and the numbers to be printed and the style as to binding, printing, and all that would be subject to the supervision of Congress. I do not know of any other way in which the evil can be corrected.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is only necessary to call attention to one fact to show that the broad language employed by the Senator from Maine would stop legislation substantially. Take, for instance, the Book of Estimates, which must be printed in order that Congress may know what to do. It requires two months of the most diligent labor in its preparation, and it cannot be well prepared unless it be printed as the work goes on.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is not that the report of the Secretary himself?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He is ordered to communicate that, and therefore it becomes a part of his annual report.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is not so treated. It is treated as an independent document, not his annual report, and it never in fact has been regarded as any part of his annual report. It has never been so considered, and I think it will turn out that there are a great many reports of subordinates which need to be printed before the assembling of Congress, in order that the Secretaries may understand what they are about and what they are recommending. They cannot go through all the manuscript reports for the purpose of preparing their own reports.

Mr. SHERMAN. To go back to the point, while I approve the object of the Senator from Maine, it does not meet the point I want to get at, that this section authorizes these documents to be distributed through the mails free of postage, because remember that when documents are printed by the Departments, they having unlimited power to order public documents to be sent to them, they may order one thousand or five thousand, and those go through the mails free to anybody they choose to send them to. All documents furnished to the heads of Departments are franked. It is true they put on the frank in the form of a stamp, but that stamp is counted as money and is charged to the Government of the United States and credited to the Post-Office Department. Why should the head of a Department, the head of a Bureau, or a clerk there have authority to distribute public documents free, when the public voice has decided that members of Congress are not fit to enjoy this privilege though they have important constituencies to represent and provide for?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator that the public voice, in my opinion, has not decided anything of the kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the public voice will decide that franking in this expensive style to the Government by the Departments, putting the tax-payers to the expense of printing these stamps, which are franks after all, as the Senator says, ought to be rooted up and some more honest system than that adopted for disseminating intelligence to the people.

Mr. SHERMAN. Another thing. It must be remembered that these Departments distribute public documents at the expense of the United States, but they are limited in the mode of distribution to the Post-Office Department. They must send their matter through the Post-Office Department. Since the franking privilege has been abolished, I can send postal matter a great deal cheaper, both to my constituents and to myself, through Adams' Express, and I do it every day. Adams' Express will carry my documents to the people of Ohio, such as are given to me here under the law, a great deal cheaper than the Government will do it. The Government charges about one-fifth of the cost of carrying a newspaper from New York to San Francisco, but it charges more for carrying a public document from here to Ohio than any express company has the face to charge. Therefore, if the Departments are to have the privilege of sending their mail matter free to the people that they choose to send it to, I prefer to leave it open so that they can avail themselves of the express companies and other means. This continues in the Departments not only an unreasonable authority to order the printing of public documents, but it continues the authority to distribute them free of charge to their favorite, selected people. That ought not to be so.

The general purpose of this bill meets my hearty approval; that is, this bill points out in a very proper way the mode of distributing the regular documents ordered by Congress for the use of the executive, legislative, and judicial authorities. The laws ought to be distributed in the same way and only to the same extent; and I do not see why the laws are not included in the twelve hundred documents distributed under the fourth section as well as the other documents that are there ordered for distribution. Surely twelve hundred would be enough. Provisions that documents shall be printed for free distribution by the Department are entirely inconsistent with the object and purpose of the bill. Therefore I move to strike out the tenth section, and I shall follow it with a motion to strike out the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth sections.

As to the distribution of the Smithsonian report, the argument does not apply, because the Smithsonian Institution is a private corporation of a charitable character that pays its own postage and does not get stamps from the Government.

I also desire to move to strike out the fifth section with a view to transferring to the fourth section a proper provision for the publication and distribution of twelve hundred copies of the laws; and then if that is not enough let those who need them apply for them and get them in the ordinary way.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator take a section at a time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CONKLING in the chair.) Which amendment does the Senator from Ohio move now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out section 10.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a motion pending to perfect that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the Senator can move to insert anything he pleases after it is stricken out.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Chair direct the Secretary to state what is the precise question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the section be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to strike out section 10, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the section, as follows:

SEC. 10. That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind such additional numbers of the annual reports of the Executive Departments, with such selections from the documents accompanying them as may be desired, as the heads of those Departments may respectively order; and also such copies of the separate reports of heads of Bureaus and other subordinate offices as the heads of their respective Departments may order: Provided, That the cost of printing and binding such additional numbers of the report of any head of Bureau or other subordinate officer of a Department be charged to the printing account of that Bureau or Department office.

Mr. HAMLIN. I understood there was an amendment pending to perfect the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is mistaken, the Chair thinks.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to make a suggestion. I have listened to what the Senator from Ohio has said, and I think there is very great force in it; indeed I do not deem it answerable, but it strikes me that there is very great propriety in allowing certain Bureaus to have certain documents which they may have the disposal of, and I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island who has the bill in charge whether it cannot be reached by letting the section remain as it is, and then providing that the persons to whom these documents shall be distributed shall pay the postage, or the cost of transmitting them. Let them stand like all others; but they may make a better distribution of them than the Public Printer. It would be desirable they should have them, but subject them to postage like all others, that postage not to be paid by the Government, but to be paid by the recipient. Then I should be in favor of retaining the section.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps the object which the Senators have might be accomplished by putting in a limit: "It shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind such additional numbers, not exceeding" so many.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the point I want to reach is that the persons who receive these documents shall receive them upon no better terms than those we send them to, and that the persons sending them shall have no particular advantages above us. I think if you put into that section a provision that the postage thereon, or the cost of transmission, shall be paid by the recipients thereof, then the distribution may be better made from these heads of Departments than in any other way. I am not for allowing them to use a frank while nobody else uses it; and that is one of the first steps to breaking down laws abolishing the system, and I am against it for that reason.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is not to be a gratuitous distribution. It is an official distribution. It is supposed that the Secretary of the Navy may desire to send his report to his subordinates, to men to whom he desires to communicate his views, men who are bound to take his advice and instruction. This is not intended for a popular distribution.

It is intended only for the heads of Departments to their subordinates and to those who administer the laws under them.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; but when a collector of customs in my State, or a postmaster in my State, wants to know what is the action of the Government or any of the Departments, and I obtain a document to send to him, I pay the postage on it or he pays it, and it is for the very same purpose that I communicate intelligence to him for his benefit that the Government will transmit it officially. I can see no difference. We are officials here in one sense of the term; and we neither receive nor send matter free. Why should others?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to the postage being paid by the recipients, although I think that the number of documents which will be sent out under this section is so small that it is not a matter of much consequence.

The abuses which the Senator from Maine on the other side of the Chamber [Mr. MORRILL] referred to of binding books in elegant style is dwelt upon at considerable length in the report accompanying this bill; but the abuse has pretty much died out. It was more conspicuous than extensive. Certainly nothing could be more ridiculous or extravagant than to see a congressional document bound in turkey morocco; but the number was very small indeed, and I think it has entirely stopped now. We passed some time ago a law that no binding should be done different from the ordinary style except on order of the head of a Department, making him immediately and personally responsible. I do not think that that abuse now exists to any considerable extent.

Mr. WEST. Is there any provision in the bill that allows any mail matter to go free, to be paid at the other end of the line?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a difficulty about that. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] suggested that; but there are propositions pending, and I have no doubt the sense of the public will induce Congress very soon to make all matter prepaid on the ground the Postmaster-General has said in an official document——

Mr. WEST. The Committee on Appropriations have reported an amendment to the post-office bill this morning that includes that.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right. The Postmaster-General has stated officially and in many other ways that two-thirds of the postage on papers sent through the mails and not prepaid is lost to the Government. That seems to be very large; but even if one-tenth is lost it seems to be a great deal. You cannot trust the postage that is collected at the place of delivery. The experience of the Department shows that it is better to require everything to be prepaid. That defeats the proposition of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want the recipient to prepay the postage by sending the amount here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then why not let him send the cost of the book at the same time and order it from the Public Printer? There is no trouble about it. The first section of this bill provides that anybody, citizen or subject, here or anywhere, may get any of these documents by paying the net cost of paper and printing and also the postage. I think that is proper.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will it meet the idea of the Senator from Maine to strike out in line 10 of section 10 the words "of the report of any head of a Department or other subordinate officer of a Department;" so as to read:

Provided, That the cost of printing and binding such additional numbers—which will cover the amount ordered by the head of a Department as well as by the head of a Bureau—be charged to the printing account of that Bureau or Department office.

So that it will be entirely under the control of the appropriation, and the Committee on Appropriations can have the appropriation itemized as much as they see fit; but I do not think it is advisable to prohibit the head of a Department from printing a report or document. It may be very necessary indeed. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who has had great experience——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. At the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts I will modify the proposition to read in this way:

Strike out the whole section and substitute:

That hereafter the Congressional Printer shall print on the order of heads of Executive Departments such limited number of the annual reports of said Departments and necessary accompanying reports of subordinate officers as may be deemed necessary for the use of Congress: Provided, That no maps or illustrations shall be printed without a special order of Congress.

That will give the Departments entire power to print all the documents that are necessary to communicate the required annual information in their reports, and will leave to Congress to exercise their judgment as to what number of additional copies shall be printed. It seems to me that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think sometimes a small illustration or map is absolutely necessary to make the text of a report understood. I think I would prefer that that portion of the substitute be left out. We can trust the heads of Departments somewhat. I do not think there is any disposition in the heads of Departments—I have not found it—to be extravagant in their printing.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not the slightest, there is nothing but the most laudable spirit of enterprise in this regard; but we know this sort of printing is very expensive and we wish to economize.

Mr. ANTHONY. When the discretion is lodged not in the head of a Bureau but in the head of a Department, I think we might strike out the prohibition against maps and illustrations. Sometimes the reports of the War Department would be entirely useless without maps.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So far as the printing of the book is concerned it may be very important by way of illustration in the end, but so far as communicating information to Congress is concerned, to enable them to judge of the style of book we shall print, I do not think they are so important as the Senator seems to think. Besides that, these illustrations and maps are the great source of expense.

Mr. ANTHONY. The maps and illustrations that have been published by the Executive Departments have been paid for out of the appropriations of the Departments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that. That is the very evil we want to avoid. That is the very difficulty we wish to get at. The object is that the Committee on Appropriations shall be able to control the exact expenditures of the Government; and to be able to control them it must have the power to judge.

Mr. ANTHONY. Suppose you put in the words "no costly illustrations and maps."

Mr. SARGENT. Say "expensive."

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; "no expensive illustrations and maps," leaving the head of the Department responsible for the fair construction of the condition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection to accepting that modification.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now let the amendment be read again from the desk.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that might be troublesome. I had better read it myself.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then read it a little louder.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The amendment is to strike out the entire tenth section and insert:

That hereafter the Congressional Printer shall print upon the order of the heads of the Executive Departments, respectively, such limited number of the annual reports of such Departments and necessary accompanying reports of subordinate officers as may be deemed necessary for the use of Congress: Provided——

Mr. ANTHONY. That should be "for the use of the Departments," not of Congress, I suppose.

Mr. SARGENT. O, no.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; let it be "for the use of Congress."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Congress is to print what it chooses. Then comes the proviso:

Provided, That no expensive maps or illustrations shall be printed without the special order of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I am perfectly willing to take that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will that be acceptable to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator from Ohio propose to strike out the eleventh section?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. If so, I will propose an amendment that I think will make it acceptable to him. I propose to insert the words "when requested so to do by the Secretary of State;" so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, when requested so to do by the Secretary of State, to cause to be printed, &c.

The papers relating to foreign affairs, to which this section is confined, are sometimes important to be printed for the purposes of foreign distribution, and certainly we can trust the Secretary of State to print fifteen hundred copies of a document that comes from his Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator, who has had much more experience than I have had in regard to these documents, thinks the Secretary of State ought to have for the public service these documents in addition to the regular number, I cannot object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should think twelve hundred copies printed would furnish one to every officer in the diplomatic service. I will not insist upon it

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think this power has ever been abused. I think the State Department, under all the Secretaries who have been in the service since I have been here, has been administered very economically in this respect. There may be times when a general obligatory law would make unnecessary printing; but if you say, "when requested to do so by the Secretary of State," I do not think there can be any abuse.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to embarrass the Departments at all. My object is to prevent an abuse if I can.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then let it read:

It shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, when requested so to do by the Secretary of State, to cause to be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number, &c.

Then after the word "number" I propose to insert the words "a number not more than."

Mr. SHERMAN. "Not exceeding."

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; "not exceeding." The law now allows twenty-five hundred copies to be printed. The Secretary of State thought fifteen hundred would be enough.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment being made, I withdraw my motion to strike out the section. I desire now to take the sense of the Senate on section 12.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now I can propose an amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] which I think will remove the objection to that section. I propose to make the last clause of the section read:

As may be requested by the Secretary of the Treasury for distribution to the officers of his Department.

Then if we find three thousand is too great for this official distribution, we can reduce the number afterward. The section will then read:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind such number, not exceeding three thousand copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on commerce and navigation as may be requested by the Secretary of the Treasury for distribution to the officers of his Department.

Certainly we ought to send the report to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to those necessary for the officers of the Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be "for the officers of the Department."

Mr. SHERMAN. "For distribution to the officers of the Department." I have no objection to the same amendment being made in regard to the reports on Indian affairs and public lands.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the same amendment can be made as to the whole of them. Will the Secretary report the section as now proposed to be amended?

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, to print and bind such number, not exceeding three thousand copies, of the annual report on commerce and navigation for distribution to the officers of his Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now the same amendment should be made in section 13, substituting the "Secretary of the Interior" for the "Secretary of the Treasury."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be reported as proposed to be amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, to print and bind such number, not exceeding two thousand copies, of the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and such number, not exceeding two thousand copies, of the annual report of the Commissioner of Public Lands, for distribution by the Secretary of the Interior to the officers of his Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no further amendment to offer.

Mr. SARGENT. I withdraw an amendment which I proposed some time ago in order that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] might get further information in regard to it. He does not seem to be in his seat. I should like to change section 14 so as to reduce the number of copies of the report of the Department of Agriculture from twenty-five thousand copies to five or ten thousand.

Mr. ANTHONY. Say fifteen thousand.

Mr. SARGENT. It ought not to be over ten thousand. This is either a free distribution or it is not. If it is for free distribution twenty-five thousand is not enough; if it is not, it is vastly too much. I move to make the number ten thousand.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have taken the number fixed in the bill on the judgment of the Commissioner of Agriculture and of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I have no further knowledge of it than what they have communicated to me. But if the Agricultural Department is worth keeping up, there ought to be some circulation of its reports.

Mr. SARGENT. I think so myself, but it should come under the same system that we apply to every other. The book is probably worth two dollars and a half or three dollars, probably four dollars. It could not be printed and sold at the book-stores for less. Under this bill it probably will be furnished to everybody who wants it for sixty or seventy cents.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, for forty-five cents.

Mr. SARGENT. Besides, if this book ought to be distributed free, it should be distributed to every farmer, and we know that is not done. The two or three hundred thousand that we print do not supply one farmer in two hundred. What are you to do? Are you to furnish copies for distribution among the remaining one hundred and ninety-nine?

This bill I understand to be a reform measure which proposes to deal with all these questions. Some Senators very much prefer the Agricultural Report. I admit the value of it. It is useful; but how about Hayden's reports? They are sought with immense avidity all through the Pacific States. The reports of Professor R. W. Raymond are very highly prized in many parts of the mining regions, and by the constituents of the Senator from Rhode Island who have mining investments. And so you might go clear through the whole list of documents. You will find that each report commends itself in a greater or less degree to some particular class of people. The Agricultural Report interests the farmers, naturally so; but if you are not to send that report free to one class of citizens, and the theory of your bill is that you are not to do it, why send it to another class and make an exception in the very body of your bill? I ask if the number, twenty-five thousand, fixed here means the number of subscribers to whom the Department so far acquits its obligations by sending them this book? If so, I am willing that it shall be sent to them at the expense of the Government, as it will be. We appropriate the money to print the book, and then we appropriate the money necessary to carry on the Post-Office Department.

If these reports are to be sent out for that purpose, I do not object; but when you go beyond that line and come down to people to whom we are under no obligations whatever, but who stand in the same category as all other citizens of the United States, then I do not know of any reason why we should extend this favor to them. Certainly it is not an answer to the objection to say that they are farmers or to say that the book is interesting, because I can show you other books which are equally interesting to other classes; and the miner is as meritorious as the farmer.

Mr. ANTHONY. I differ with my friend from California, not as to the purpose of this distribution, but only as to the amount of it. It should not be a free distribution but an official distribution. Perhaps that might be regulated by making the section read:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, at the request of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to print not exceeding twenty-five thousand copies, or so much of the same as may be necessary to supply his correspondents.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the question would arise, what do you mean by "correspondents?" A man who corresponds with the Commissioner and asks him to send him a copy of his report?

Mr. ANTHONY. O, no. No head of the Department would put such a construction upon it.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has drawn an amendment which will cover the case exactly. It is to make the section read:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print not exceeding twenty-five thousand copies of the report of the Department of Agriculture for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture to those only who are employed in the office or contribute information for the use of the Department.

I submit that amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. That I have no objection to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to add "and agricultural societies."

Mr. SARGENT. I do not see any reason for that. The whole theory of the bill goes upon the other principle. It must be a notable agricultural society that only wants one volume of the Agricultural Report!

Mr. ANTHONY. It wants one for its library.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; it wants one for its library; but agricultural societies want hundreds to distribute among their members and their libraries, and it must be a very poor agricultural society that comes and asks us to make an exception in its favor from our whole bill to save sixty cents or seventy-five cents, the cost of the book. I see no reason why an agricultural society should be furnished with this report free by the Government any more than any other society. Take educational books; what are you going to do with those? Will you send them to the school-teachers of the country, or each school-teachers' association? They are just as meritorious, and perhaps more so. Would the Senator want to make that discrimination, that distinction, and refuse to give to associations of teachers—and they are numerous in every State—the report on education? Certainly, moral agriculture is quite as important as physical agriculture.

It seems to me that by this amendment you put the seeds of dissolution in your bill. You start out with a theory, and destroy your theory pro tanto before it can pass the Senate. Now, either you stand upon a principle, or you do not. Either the English system is correct, and that makes none of these exceptions, or it is a failure. Either there ought to be a general distribution, or there ought not to be this partial free distribution. Now, which do you choose?

For myself, I am willing to give the repeal of the franking privilege a fair show to see whether we can make the post-office self-sustaining, and I furthermore most earnestly desire that the extravagant printing of public documents may be broken up. I think it is one of the growing evils of the times, and has been for several years past. The cost of printing year by year has mounted up, and we have tried all sorts of expedients to stop it. We have tried to do it by putting the responsibility on the Departments and limiting the amount they shall spend for the purpose; but they come in, when three-quarters of the year is gone, and show us that unless we give them more money for printing some very necessary blanks which they need cannot be printed and their business will stop; but during the antecedent parts of the year they will have printed and bound expensive volumes for presentation.

I believe that we can only get at the root of this matter by putting the power in the hands of Congress to order to be printed the documents which shall be distributed, and making no distinction among our citizens, having no favored classes who shall receive those documents free while other citizens pay. It is only by adhering to the principle which I understood the Committee on Printing stood by in bringing forward this bill that we can reform these abuses. If the Committee on Printing abandon it, if they are going to make an exception in the body of the bill for a class no more meritorious than the class of associated teachers or other associations, then I am opposed to the bill. I do not want a bill to pass which upon the very face of it contains a contradiction of its principle. I do not want such a scheme in operation which carries with it the seeds of dissolution. We had better wait for a better time, until we can rid our minds of local influences or favored classes, and can resist the blandishments of any class; ay, sir, and can get above the fear of any class. I do not believe there is any class of people in this country who should scare American Senators from their propriety or lead them to make exceptions in their favor in general laws; I do not care whether they be sailors, mechanics, miners, or whatever class. I do not care whether grangers, or sailors' association, or sailors' boarding-houses combine; we are required to legislate without fear or favor for the people of the United States.

The Committee on Printing have brought forward a bill here which provides that there shall be no fear or favor in the distribution of public documents, that everybody shall pay, and everybody pay alike; and before the bill has gone through the Senate it is proposed, and it comes with the sanction of that committee, that we pick out certain classes of the community and that they shall be favored above others. Sir, I scorn and reject any principle which would sanction action of this sort. I believe our bill should be harmonious; that it should treat all alike; and then we shall have a principle to stand on, and we can hope that it will survive the session of Congress at which it passes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand where the fear and favor come in with reference to this proposition that the agricultural societies of the country shall have a copy of the Agricultural Report; and as I do not see it, I certainly do not feel it.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand the proposition is to send free to agricultural societies the Agricultural Report, and we send it to nobody else free, and we do not send the other documents named in this bill free to associations of the same character, having the same relations to other kinds of documents. That is where the favor comes in.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the Senator; but I do not see what my friend is afraid of, or where the favor comes in.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I cannot speak plainly enough to enlighten you.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I was opposed to the repeal of the franking privilege. I spoke against it; I voted against it; but I do not mean to keep irritated all the time because it has been abolished, and to have legislation so constructed as to make the abolition of the franking privilege offensive. I accept it as a fixed fact that the franking privilege is abolished, and I want to make legislation correspond with that fact and be as agreeable to the people as it can be.

Now in this very bill we provide that each Senator and Representative shall have one entire set of our publications to give to any institution that he pleases, so that our colleges will get the publications of Congress without paying for them and without postage; and my proposition is that the agricultural societies of the country shall stand in the same position. I suppose they are able to pay for them, and so I suppose our literary institutions are able to pay for them. They are not, to use the language of my friend, so mean that they cannot pay sixty cents. I trust we are not any meaner than they are. We can afford to give them one copy of this report, as we are printing it, if it does not cost more than sixty cents; and I hope for the benefit of this class of the community, who receive very little favor from the Government, this amendment may be adopted. Very likely it will be neglected; they will not apply for it; but it is desirable that this information should be spread.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the fourteenth section, so as to read—

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind not exceeding twenty-five thousand copies of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture to those only who are employed by the Department or who contribute information for the use of the Department.

It is proposed to amend that amendment by adding:

And also to agricultural societies.

Mr. GORDON. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey a question? What is intended to be included in the words "agricultural societies?" Does he mean all the granges that are in existence?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; I mean organized societies, such as exist in almost every county for the promotion of agriculture.

Mr. GORDON. Twenty-five thousand copies would not answer. The number of copies named in the bill would not furnish each agricultural society in the United States with a copy.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. O, yes; a little more than a copy.

Mr. GORDON. I move to add the words "and agricultural granges of Patrons of Husbandry." I am for giving it to these agricultural people.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to be outdone in generosity. If in order I will move to add further, "and every farmer in the United States."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to hear the amendment of the Senator from Georgia reported before anything else is done.

Mr. GORDON. After the words "agricultural societies," I move to add the words "and each grange of the Patrons of Husbandry."

Mr. ANTHONY. That is not in order. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia is out of order.

Mr. GORDON. I give notice, then, that I shall offer it as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is to add to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island "and to each organized agricultural society."

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the amendment to which that attaches?

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to which that is to be added is to insert at the end of the fourteenth section the words:

To those only who are employed by the Department or who contribute information for the use of the Department.

The question being put on the amendment to the amendment, a division was called for; which resulted—ayes 18, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a quorum present if Senators will vote. Let us have another division.

Mr. ALCORN. Let the vote be retaken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question again for the purpose of ascertaining if there be a quorum.

The question being again put, there were on a division—ayes 23, noes 19.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, one-fifth of the Senators not rising to second the call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the attention of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California will state his point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. My point of order is that the yeas and nays were ordered. I supposed that was the case, and sat down expecting them to be taken. I should like to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair decided there were not enough up to order them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But three Senators rose to support the call, as the Chair counted.

Mr. SARGENT. The Chair was more particular in his count than usual. I have often seen the yeas and nays ordered with only one Senator up. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair very frequently does not count himself, but relies on the clerks. The Chair did count on this occasion.

Mr. SARGENT. There will be an opportunity I believe to call for the yeas and nays in the Senate on this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I suppose I may proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia in order that he may offer his amendment.

Mr. GORDON. I inquire of the Chair whether the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey was defeated or adopted? I did not hear the announcement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was adopted.

Mr. GORDON. Now I move to add to that amendment the words "and to each organized grange of the Patrons of Husbandry."

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island as amended.

A division was called for on the amendment as amended.

Mr. OGLESBY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the amendment read upon which we are about to vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Section 14 as it originally stood in the bill was as follows:

SEC. 14. That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind twenty-five thousand copies of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture, for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The amendment is to make the section read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to bind not exceeding twenty-five thousand copies of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture, for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture to those only who are employed by the Department or who contribute information for the use of the Department, and to each organized agricultural society, and also to each organized grange of the Patrons of Husbandry.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Rhode Island explain why it is that you propose to give every clerk in the Department of Agriculture and every laborer and everybody else that the Commissioner chooses to say belongs to him, the first cut, as the saying is, at this body of twenty-five thousand volumes. According to the statement that was made the other day in some debate about the room which belongs to that concern, there would not be any of the twenty-five thousand left for the agricultural societies and granges. The Senate must either increase the number here or strike out what has been suggested. As to giving these copies to the laborers and other people employed by the Commissioner of Agriculture over on the Island, I cannot imagine what advantage it is going to be to the agricultural interests of the United States to take a thousand or whatever the number may be of this twenty-five thousand to be distributed by the Commissioner of Agriculture exclusively to those who are employed by him. Take the women who scrub his floors; I do not mean his apartments, for I suppose they are taken care of at his private expense, but I mean the public floors of that institution; is it necessary that a copy of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be furnished to each of them to instruct the scrubbing-women in their duties? Does it contain the scrubbing code? That will not do, Mr. President. You ought not to provide anything of that kind. You must either trust the discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture, or you must make some other provision different from this. If the Senator from New Jersey had coupled his motion to insert agricultural societies, who certainly or their members are very proper people to have these reports, and the new agricultural societies that are called granges, there would have been great force in it; but to take the first and the best distribution and make those who would come first in this distribution the employés of the Department of Agriculture, it appears to me defeats the proper distribution of the document. We either ought to cut them out, or we ought to vote down this whole amendment and begin again, so that these books can be properly distributed among the public where they will do some good.

Mr. GORDON. I hope the Senator from Vermont will move to strike out the provision for the employés.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But unhappily that has been already agreed to. I cannot move to strike it out now. The whole thing has become one amendment.

Mr. GORDON. I beg the Senator's pardon. When we come into the Senate he can move it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are not in the Senate now. I am talking about the question now pending; and what obliges me to vote against this mixed condition of affairs by which scrubbing-women in the Department are to compete with agricultural and grange societies in distant sections of the country to get these reports. I do not think that is the thing.

Mr. TIPTON. I have always been in favor of a free distribution of the public documents, and I am gratified now to find that we are going back to that principle. No doubt we shall increase the number of twenty-five thousand in this section of the bill to one hundred thousand, for we must have at least one hundred thousand if we are going to reach all the granges. No man can number the granges that have been organized within the last year or two in this country and mathematically come to any conclusion on the subject. One hundred thousand at least of the Agricultural Report must be prepared to meet this distribution. Then when we come to the report of the Commissioner of Education, if every grange is to receive a copy of the Agricultural Report, every school district is to be supplied with the report on the subject of education, every college, every seminary, every commissioner and superintendent of schools, and then we come down to the grange divisions, and we will distribute them to the trustees of schools in each school district and to the school teachers themselves. By taking this course in regard to that document and sending the report of the Smithsonian Institution in the same manner, and then by the same disposition of the valuable report on the subject of commerce to all men engaged in commercial pursuits, or at least to the captains of all vessels engaged in commercial pursuits, and all men engaged in the warehousing institutions of the country, we shall have the free distribution of documents again; and that is what I desire shall be adopted by the Senate. I shall vote for one hundred thousand of the Agricultural Report to be distributed in this manner.

Mr. ANTHONY. I see that the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] is going to have his own way, and therefore I will suggest to him, as he seems to have me in his power, to change the number from twenty-five thousand to fifteen thousand, and then allow the section to stand as it is in the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I am perfectly willing to agree to that, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I hope this whole amendment will be voted down and the number of twenty-five thousand reduced to fifteen thousand and left to the discretion of the Commissioner. We must intrust some discretion to our executive officers.

Mr. LOGAN. For distribution to agricultural societies?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, in his discretion. He has a great many correspondents, and the only return they get for the information they furnish him in regard to the state of the crops is this report. If the information comes from societies, he will send the books to the societies, but I think we must leave it in the discretion of the Commissioner.

Mr. LOGAN. Is it meant by that to deprive the societies of the book?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not to deprive them of it. The bill as originally reported puts twenty-five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture at the disposal of the Commissioner for distribution, the intention being that they shall be distributed to those who furnish him information. I propose now to reduce that number of twenty-five thousand to fifteen thousand, and leave it entirely in his discretion.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the reduction would make the number so small that the distribution would not amount to much. Take the different agricultural societies that furnish information; I suppose he gets over a hundred thousand letters every year from farmers all over the country. The distribution of fifteen thousand would be a mere bagatelle.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. When I was a member of Congress representing a district in the other House, I used to distribute two or three thousand myself. I distributed what were allowed to me, and then I got persons representing cities to exchange large numbers of their agricultural reports for other documents, and I could not begin to supply the men who really wanted the information. If you intend to compliment the men who furnish information to the Department of Agriculture twenty-five thousand copies will not do it. I certainly would not reduce that number. I think twenty-five thousand is a very small number to be sent as a mere compliment to men who send information. They furnish it free and take great trouble in gathering it, and I think they ought to have a book.

Mr. SARGENT. The list shown to us contains but six thousand.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree with the Senator from Illinois, but I prefer fifteen thousand to having any of these blatherskiting amendments adopted.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to discuss the matter, but I think it very poor economy to refuse to furnish as a compliment the public document that is of more value than any other to the farming classes of the country. It is one in which they find a great deal of beneficial information, and great improvements have been made through information obtained from that source by the farming community in the different States.

Mr. ANTHONY. It will be printed for sale at a very low price.

Mr. LOGAN. That is true; but if you intend to compliment people at all, you had better print enough to enable the Department to send a copy to each man who furnishes it information.

Mr. WINDOM. There seems to be an understanding on the part of some gentlemen who have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] that it was designed to kill the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] I did not so vote for it. I voted for it in good faith. I believe in the distribution of these documents, and I believe no better way can be found than to distribute them as suggested by that amendment. In almost all of these organizations, as I am informed, there is a library for the use of the organization. They are organizations of farmers, and I think to put one of these reports in each library of such an organization is a very good distribution to make, and am in favor of it in good faith.

Mr. GORDON. I only want to add one word to what the Senator from Minnesota has just said. I am daily in receipt from my own people of requests to send these reports to the grangers. I have no doubt every Senator on this floor gets letters of the same sort. If we are going to print these Agricultural Reports for the benefit of the country, I do not know any persons who are more justly entitled to them or to whom they will be of greater benefit than those who are engaged in the business of agriculture. I think, therefore, it is the proper way to distribute them, and I should like to get rid of that portion of this amendment which provides for a distribution to those employed by the Agricultural Bureau, and I hope we shall find some way to get at it. I shall vote for the general amendment with the view that in the Senate we will strike out that portion and allow these Agricultural Reports to go to the people who are engaged in agriculture.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have expressed my opinion so often on the subject of the distribution of public documents for the benefit of the people that I need scarcely repeat what I have preached upon that subject until I suppose everybody is tired of it. I opposed the repeal of the franking privilege, as it was called; the "duty," I called it, of answering the respectful petitions and communications of citizens of the United States addressed to Senators and members of Congress about public business, and of sending to citizens of the United States who are entitled to know what their Government is doing the public documents of the country which show what the Government is doing and for which the people pay. I opposed the repeal of that law upon that ground. It was repealed on the theory that it was abused. Well, you might as well repeal every law you have upon that theory, because you have not a law which organizes any part of this Government that does not have abuses. They are inseparable from human nature and from human government.

It is perfectly true, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has said, that the agricultural people of the United States are entitled to have the information that their taxes pay for being acquired spread among them. There is no use in keeping up a Department of Agriculture if you are going to suppress and conceal from the agriculturists of the country the valuable information that that department collects. I do not think anybody can dispute that. There is not the slightest use of it at all; and we are either squandering hundreds of thousands—I do not know how much the total expenditures for the Commissioner of Agriculture are—or we must allow the people to realize the benefit that this institution is to confer by its collection of information, by its introduction of new ideas about farming among the people who are to make use of them; and the same may be said somewhat largely, but perhaps not to so great an extent, of the operations of every other branch of the Government.

I shall therefore vote as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] suggested, for a very large number of these books, as large as before we repealed the franking bill, to be distributed among societies and among citizens of the United States engaged in agriculture in order that they may know what their Government is doing, in order that they may get some return and the best possible return in the way of increased intelligence and disseminated information for the taxes they pay to carry on these branches and departments of their Government. I beg the Senator from Minnesota to understand that other people as well as himself are absolutely in earnest in their endeavor to get out of the wrong position that we took in my opinion in the stopping of these publications and suppressing them from the people who are entitled to have them, when we abolished what was called the franking privilege.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think the question of the publication of documents is at all concerned in this question. It is the distribution of them, whether they shall be distributed at the expense of the Treasury of the United States or at the expense of the people who ask for them and desire them. The bill goes upon the latter ground, and this question arises necessarily growing out of the action of Congress in the repeal of the franking privilege under which frank these documents were formerly distributed.

Everybody yielded, as the Senator from Vermont says, whatever his convictions might have been of the propriety or impropriety of that measure, to a general clamor in the country that the distribution of public documents as a matter of gratuity was an abuse and that Congress were censurable for that abuse. Now the Committee on Printing, acting in good faith in this case to meet the precise question of the distribution of public documents, have said in substance as a principle that we will publish these documents and we will distribute them to the people, to anybody who asks for them, at the cost price. That makes it equal and just everywhere, while the old distribution was partial and unjust necessarily. Now the innovations on this bill, every one of them, are a departure from that principle. They are partial and they are favorite, and my honorable friend from New Jersey in his solicitude for the distribution of the Agricultural Reports has violated the principle in attempting to distribute them to societies.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think not. These societies communicate information to the department.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If they do, put it on that ground then; but they are already provided for if they come within that category.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No one will suppose that an agricultural society exists without having more or less intercourse with, and giving information to, the Department of Agriculture; and yet they do not stand in the relation of agents. There are some six thousand persons who really hold the position of agents, who send agricultural information monthly, who send weather statistics; and all the compensation that they receive is by paying them this compliment. But agricultural societies do not stand in that relation of agency to the department, and therefore it is a great deal better if we mean that they shall have the distribution made to them, that we should plainly state it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Any gratuitous distribution upon any ground whatever is a departure from the principle, and will involve us in infinite trouble and in the end overthrow the whole question of the distribution of public documents on which we stand. That will be the upshot of the thing. The only excuse for this provision as it comes from the committee is that they distribute these books to persons who do pay for them in their services, and to that extent it is proper. It is not a gratuitous distribution, and therefore I am in favor of that proposition; but I am opposed to all amendments beyond that.

And now coming to the proposition of my honorable friend from Georgia, if my honorable friend designs that as a compliment to these people, I am afraid they will think it a very cheap one. It is a departure from the general principle; and why should an organization of that kind be selected to be distinguished by a gratuitous distribution of a volume which would cost it sixty cents and not more, to the exclusion of other worthy people all over the country? The difficulty about it is that it is vicious in its character. It is vicious because it is a departure from the principle, and it is calculated to break down the whole measure. That is the real difficulty. I do not mean to be offensive to my honorable friend; he knows I could not be intentionally; but if it is intended as a compliment, I am very much afraid, to repeat myself, that those people will think it a very cheap one that the Senate of the United States proposes to pay them when it proposes to give them a volume in this way and depart from the principle upon which this whole measure depends.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me that if this amendment is voted down, and then the number reduced from twenty-five to fifteen thousand in the section, it will not infringe upon the principle.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would not object to that at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the Senator from California will assent to that amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Cheerfully.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But the difficulty in the way is the amendment already put on.

Mr. ANTHONY. I propose to vote that down.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand my honorable friend from Georgia to say that the great difficulty with him is that there is a provision in the text of the bill which authorizes a distribution of these reports by the Commissioner of Agriculture to contributors. I suggest to him that that provision is not in contravention of the general principle of the bill, because to that extent it will be seen that it is a return or in the nature of compensation for services rendered. Therefore it is not objectionable to the criticism of my honorable friend, I think.

Mr. GORDON. I have but a word to say in reply to the honorable Senator from Maine. I did not intend my amendment as any idle compliment. I object to the fourteenth section of the bill as it stands reported by the committee. I am unwilling that the head of any Department shall have twenty-five thousand copies of a public document to distribute as he may see fit. I prefer to designate to whom these documents shall go, and if we are to designate to whom they shall go, I ask the honorable Senator to whom can they better go than to the men who are sufficiently interested in agriculture to form themselves into societies? I can see no more appropriate way to distribute the information, no more certain way to get the information in these documents, if it be valuable, to the agricultural people of the country than through organized societies of gentlemen engaged in agriculture. It is known to those who are acquainted with these organizations—and I may say here that I am not a member of them—that each one of these granges has what is known as a lecturer, a man who is designated to impart information. These volumes put into his hands will furnish him with such information as is gathered from the general experience of agriculturists all over the country. It is for this reason, and this reason alone, that I have proposed the amendment, that agricultural information may be given in the most satisfactory and certain manner to the people who are engaged in that particular department of industry. I think that a sufficient answer to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one word upon this amendment as it now stands. In the State of Iowa seven-tenths if not eight-tenths of the people are engaged in agriculture. I doubt whether there is any State east or west that has, in proportion to its population and age, a greater number of agricultural societies than we have. We have a State organization; we have organizations in every county, I think, of the hundred in the State, and many district societies. I am advised that there are some two thousand to twenty-five hundred of what are known as organized granges. I am satisfied from my knowledge of the people there, and it is very general, that there is no document published by any Department that is so generally sought for as the Agricultural Report. Congress has published heretofore from two to three hundred thousand copies of this report. Of the number of volumes assigned me since coming here every volume has been exhausted, and I could have distributed to persons who actually needed them, as they said by their letters, three or four, if not five times the number I received. I made it a point in my distribution to send to all libraries and societies, agricultural and otherwise, in the State as far as I could.

Now, it is proposed by this bill that we shall publish twenty-five thousand copies of this work, and it is suggested that we vote down this amendment and reduce the number to fifteen thousand. I shall vote against any reduction, and if I have an opportunity shall vote to double the number from twenty-five to fifty thousand. I shall vote against this amendment for this reason: I can see no propriety in providing that this document shall be distributed to any particular persons more than in any other case where we publish a document and provide that it shall be distributed to particular persons throughout the country. I grant you that the agricultural societies and those who are building up libraries should be supplied in the first instance, but they will be supplied necessarily and without any provision of this kind in the law, and I do not believe the persons who are building up these libraries, whether they be agricultural societies or not, expect of us that we shall put a provision of this kind in the law. I think it is better that we provide that there shall be fifty or one hundred thousand copies of this work printed and let them be in the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture like any other work, and if I am entitled to any proportion of the number that shall be thus published, be it one hundred, five hundred, or a thousand copies, I propose, as far as I can, to distribute them just as I have distributed them heretofore, whether I have the franking privilege or not. If I do not pay the postage, I know that all over my State there are those who will want these volumes, and twenty-five thousand is no number at all. If you fix twenty-five thousand as the maximum, you will not be able to supply one organization in ten hardly throughout the States that want them. I therefore am opposed to this amendment and to making any provision as to the distribution, because I feel certain that they will go to these organizations anyhow, and I see no more propriety in putting this amendment in as to the Agricultural Report than in putting it in with reference to any other book that you may have that it shall go to particular persons.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, we have already agreed that other publications which are named in this bill shall be distributed only to the officers of the Government charged with the duties to which the publication relates. What is called the franking privilege, as I have had experience when it existed and since its abolition, was no privilege to members of Congress, but a burden. It having been abolished, the abolition carries with it properly the abolition of all printing of documents for the purpose of gratuitous distribution; and the more closely we adhere to that doctrine the more certainly we shall ascertain the public sentiment of the country upon the question of the free distribution of documents printed at the public expense. We must put the agricultural interest upon the same basis as every other interest. There is no more reason or right in the free printing and distribution at the public expense of the annual treatise on agriculture to farmers than there is of the free printing and free distribution of the annual treatise on commerce to men engaged in commercial pursuits.

If after experience the public judgment shall be that it is wise to restore the franking privilege with reference to public documents, let it be restored. The franking privilege for private purposes is worth nothing. The franking privilege for public purposes is a burden to those who are compelled to exercise it, and the only way we can ascertain what the public sentiment is upon this matter is to cut off all printing except that which is necessary for the officers who are charged with public duties, and leave everybody else, whether farmer, merchant, or manufacturer, who desires a public document, to purchase it and pay the cost of transporting it to his own home.

Therefore I am against printing any document except for two purposes: to supply those officers of the Government who are charged with public duties and from the nature of their duties require the use of the document, and for sale at its actual cost and the expense of distribution to be charged upon the purchasers, and the same in reference to farmers as in reference to everybody else.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken if he is under the impression that any different rule is suggested by this amendment in reference to farmers than in reference to merchants.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator will look at the twelfth section of this very bill which we are amending he will see that the treatise on commerce and navigation is to be distributed only to public officers.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We do not differ on the distribution that is to be made of the treatise on commerce. We differ as to the principle upon which the amendment proposes to distribute the Agricultural Reports. It is perfectly impossible for the Department of Agriculture to sit in the room of the Commissioner and get up information and statistics from every part of this country without having sources of information. Now he has some six thousand agencies in different parts of the country, who send him an account of the condition of the crops, weather statistics, and all such information—hundreds and thousands of letters, which are aggregated in this report. The compensation that he makes them is the compliment of one of these books. Then, besides that, he has foreign exchanges which he carries on by means of these volumes. Then, besides that, he is in more or less intercourse and communication with the different agricultural societies of the country, and he sends them—not every one of them, but as the circumstances render it proper—one of these reports. The whole number hitherto given to the Commissioner of Agriculture when we circulated three hundred thousand free was twenty-five thousand, the same number that is proposed now when that circulation is stopped; and I am informed by him that to carry on agreeably and with propriety this interchange of information with foreign countries, with these societies, with these agencies, this number of twenty-five thousand is none too much.

My friend from Iowa speaks of having enough printed to supply the farming interest. That I am not in favor of at all. We will print enough, but they will buy those and pay the postage on them. I think that this proposition as it came from the committee, on the information they had obtained from the Commissioner, is just about the proposition we ought to adopt without specifying that they are to go to any one.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would ask the Senator from New Jersey whether after the offering of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, by which this document is to be distributed to all those who contribute information for the use of the Department, which of course includes any agricultural society that comes within that description, he did not himself ask the Senate to add the words "and to every agricultural society in the country," covering of course a great many that, upon the limitation suggested by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, had not contributed information for the department, and if he did not in that proposition depart from the rule which he now lays down and open the way for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia and others that might be inclined to go in the same direction.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator need not ask me whether I did not offer that amendment. It is a matter of record that I did; but it is not a departure at all from the principle. The number is limited to twenty-five thousand. The amendment was: "not to exceed twenty-five thousand to be given to those who afford information." Now, you cannot say that an agricultural society affords information in the sense that an agent does; and yet there is constant intercourse with them, and my amendment named and specified so as to remove all doubt about it, that to a limited extent, never to exceed twenty-five thousand in all, that distribution might be made.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next at twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The Chair put the question and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for a division.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the motion will not be agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stevenson, Stockton, and Windom—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Sherman, Washburn, West, and Wright—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Howe, Jones, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, Tipton, and Wadleigh—17.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to reconsider the vote by which we agreed to adjourn over until Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is going on by general consent——

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. We ought to get through with the bill. I hope my friend from Minnesota will allow the bill to be disposed of.

Mr. WINDOM. I yielded at one o'clock to-day to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island for half an hour to pass this bill. We have had the question submitted by the Committee on Transportation under discussion for two days, and probably could conclude it in an hour or two, and I expected when this bill was taken up that we should be able, after its disposition, to conclude that to-day. I believe that if the Senate adjourns over until Monday that question will not be fairly heard. The committee has two bills which I believe it was the understanding should be heard, and I ask that the Senate will reconsider the vote just taken in order that the committee may have a hearing.

We have spent at least two solid months, if not three, during this session in the discussion of one of the great questions before the American people, the finance question. We are now within two weeks of the close of this session. We have done nothing whatever with reference to the other question, and I can assure Senators here that in a very large portion of this country there is as much interest felt in that as in any other question that can come before Congress. I believe that to adjourn over now and to lose another day and permit the appropriation bills to press upon us on Monday, is to defeat action upon the measure, and I therefore have made the motion to reconsider.

The Senator from Illinois was very desirous to have an hour or two for the business of his Committee on Military Affairs which has had no opportunity and has not been heard during the session. It does seem to me that the Senate can afford to sit to-morrow, as we have but two weeks more of this session, in order to dispose of these questions and to transact the business that is pressing upon us. An appropriation bill is ready; the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] gave us notice to-day that he would on Monday press the post-office appropriation bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] gave notice that he would press the moiety bill, which ought to be acted upon. There are half a dozen important measures now pressing upon us and only twelve working days left of this session. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will withdraw that for a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland withdraw his motion?

Mr. WINDOM. I had not yielded yet to the honorable Senator from Maryland to make a motion to lay on the table. I had said "Mr. President" and was about to proceed further; but if the Senator from Illinois or the Senator from Vermont, whom I see on their feet, wishes to say anything I will yield; but not to a motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota, it seems, had not concluded his remarks.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I thought he had.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When the Senator concludes his remarks the Senator from Illinois or myself will try to get the floor. I am willing to wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Maryland and will adhere to that if the Senator from Minnesota has concluded his remarks. If not, he will proceed.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to say nothing further on the subject than that it was agreed by our friends on this side of the House that we should have an opportunity to dispose of the question from the Committee on Transportation. We are not likely to dispose of it if we adjourn over now and time is lost; and if it is not disposed of, upon them be the responsibility.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I now make my motion——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not make the motion just now. Give us fair play.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. LOGAN. The objection I have to adjourning over to-morrow is in fact the same that has been suggested by the Senator from Minnesota. It does seem to me that we are approaching so near the close of the session that there ought to be at least a disposition on the part of the Senate to complete the business that we have already reported from committees. I asked on the day before yesterday that I might have two or three hours to-day to attempt at least to pass some bills that have been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. They are not of great importance, it is true, but there are many of them which are in favor of poor people who absolutely need, if the Senate should concur with the committee, what is contained in the bills for them; and there is a necessity really to have some action in many cases. There are one or two important matters reported from that committee that I should like to have action upon. I do desire to have action on them at the first opportunity I can get. The appropriation bills are pressing and I see the time of the Senate is gliding away and I cannot perceive any opportunity which I shall have to urge these bills. I presume others on other committees feel in the same way.

I should like very much if the Senate would agree at least that we might sit to-morrow, and if the Senate will agree to do so, I will ask that to-morrow, or at least a portion of it, be assigned to the Military Committee, or if the Senator from Minnesota desires that his matter should be acted upon, I shall have no objection to yielding to that if I may have the time left after that to have action on the bills reported from the Military Committee.

I hope therefore that the Senate will not lay the motion to reconsider on the table, but that after spending so much time at this session as we have in the discussion we have had we may now have a few working days to transact the business of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senate is to sit to-morrow, the thing that we ought to do would be to take up the Calendar and go through with those cases about which there is no strenuous dispute or difference of opinion; and if the Senate sits to-morrow I shall feel it to be a duty toward those who have cases on the Calendar of that kind—which will include a large number of those of the Senator from Illinois I presume—to insist on that course; that is, to object to any arrangement contrary to the rule by which special business shall be taken up to the exclusion of others.

But my motive for making the motion to adjourn over was one which I thought other committees besides my own would feel the justice of as applied to themselves. In the last days of the session, of course we are all of us obliged to be more punctual in our attendance in the Senate Chamber to attend to the duty that belongs to us here, and we have less time to work in committee. The House of Representatives is sending over to us continually large numbers of bills which are so far perfected and many of which it is indispensable should be passed upon at this session, such as some of those relating to the election of members of Congress, such as those relating to some of the railroad questions of the country, and a variety of things that must be considered by committees. I now speak of course only for the Judiciary Committee; and in order that we might have to-morrow to take up this fresh business from the House and which requires immediate attention and put it in a condition to report it to the Senate on Monday, I made the motion. I think there is good sense in it; and there is time enough, plenty of time, to attend to all these important matters, and to the Transportation Committee and the appropriation bills as well, in the next two weeks. There is no difficulty about it. The only thing that will happen will be that we shall diminish the length of the observations that we make upon questions.

But what is the pending question that the Senator from Minnesota has charge of? It is a resolution directing the Committee on Commerce or Appropriations, no matter which, or both, to report an amendment to the river and harbor bill which shall provide for certain surveys. The honorable Senator is perfectly well aware, I suppose, that on the river and harbor bill he is entitled, if his committee authorize him to do so, to move an amendment, without any vote of the Senate at all, which shall accomplish exactly that object. So then his case is not going to be ignored by the fact that we do not go on and pass a formal resolution that a committee shall bring before us for consideration a subject which the honorable Senator himself and his committee have a right to bring before our consideration when the river and harbor bill shall be brought forward.

Really, therefore, except for the purpose of creating in advance a sentiment in the Senate—and a just one it may be; I am not discussing that; I have no right to discuss it now—there is no necessity whatever in my opinion for the resolution of the Senator from Minnesota. The Committee on Transportation may report an amendment of that kind and send it to the Committee on Commerce; and I believe even that is not necessary, because that rule only applies to general appropriation bills; but never mind that, he can do it, and then this provision can be made. That being so, I do not think we ought to fash our beards on the subject of not having sufficient discussion of a question which lies within so narrow a range—I mean in respect of our capacity to understand it—as a question of this kind. It would not take any one here long to make up his mind I suppose whether it was best to inaugurate a survey of the connection of the great lakes with the sea-board and with a view to a canal, or whether it was best to inaugurate a survey from the Virginia shore to the West with a view to another canal. Everybody can understand the bearings of such a question in a very short time. But why should I enlarge upon that?

I have only explained the motive that I had, a motive of necessity for the advance of the public business that is in charge of at least one committee of this body, that we should adjourn over Saturday, and thereby gain in labor accomplished rather than lose. In that point of view I move to lay this motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator to yield a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont withdraw the motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will yield if the Senator from Minnesota will renew the motion when he concludes.

Mr. WINDOM. I will yield to the Senator from Vermont to renew it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. Well, I will make the contract to renew the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator speaks of the business of the Transportation Committee as if the resolution now pending was the only business of that committee before the Senate. There are already three bills reported from that committee which we are anxious to have the action of the Senate upon. One of those bills occupied the attention of the House of Representatives for three weeks. The committee have reported that bill back with amendments. We desire to have it heard. It will create a considerable amount of discussion. There is another bill also which we deem of importance with reference to the organization of a Bureau of Commerce, which I desire to have heard and the committee does. We have also reported from that committee another bill for the purpose of opening the mouth of the Mississippi River. There is a very large portion of the country deeply interested in that subject. We should at least give it a little time for discussion.

When we have but two weeks of the session left, it seems to me that we might devote one day to the discussion of that great question; and yet if we are to adjourn over now, I feel perfectly certain that with the appropriation bills pressing upon us and the feeling that there is no time to discuss these questions, they will go over to the next session and be ignored by this Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, as I agreed to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say one word.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator insisted that I should make the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And now I ask the Senator to withdraw it.

Mr. WINDOM. I will withdraw the motion if the Senator will agree to renew it and if he will also agree to yield to me in case I shall want to say anything after he gets through.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I agree to both.

Mr. ALCORN. I would suggest——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to say, not to occupy the time of the Senate, what I ought to have said before, that there are eight conferences now pending between the two Houses which require the time of twenty-four Senators, and they ought to be enabled to-morrow to finish up those conference affairs. I was reminded of that and should have mentioned it before. Now I renew the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to lay the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to adjourn from to-day until Monday on the table.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Stevenson, Stockton, and Tipton—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Ramsey, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—20.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3095) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 882) for the relief of the savings department of the Eagle and Phœnix Manufacturing Company, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. It is a bill to relieve from taxes that have been imposed and not collected, and not a bill to pay money.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. No. 2655) to provide for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States, and to promote the efficiency of the life-saving service;

A bill (H. R. No. 2887) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3595) to provide for deepening the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The bill (H. R. No. 3601) to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876 was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 3602) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas T. Fauntleroy and Charles H. Williamson, citizens of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds.

On motion by Mr. PATTERSON, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LEWIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to submit an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, appropriating for the relief of destitute colored women and children in the District of Columbia $10,000. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. Inasmuch as the Senate has agreed to adjourn over until Monday, and as by unanimous consent I had a portion of this day given to me for the benefit of the Military Committee, which I yielded, I hope now the Senate will consent that I may have on Monday sufficient time to call the attention of the Senate to the different bills that are of some importance reported from the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the expiration of the morning hour, the Senate will proceed to consider bills reported by the Military Committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall feel it my duty to insist on taking up the moiety bill, as it is called. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Illinois. I do not know that the bill to which I refer will take any considerable time; but it is pressing upon us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects, the Chair understands.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to give notice that I shall antagonize the measures from the Transportation Committee with any other business that may come up next week and shall press them on all occasions. If the Senate choose to vote them down, let them take the responsibility.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the fourteenth section of the bill which has been under discussion, as amended, be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As proposed to be amended?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, sir; that it be printed separately.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its being printed, but I hope the bill will be disposed of to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I had not quite got through with my suggestion. I am very sorry to see the disposition of some gentlemen here, after unanimous consent was given to the committee to which I belong to have their measures considered to-day, to oppose the allowance of any time to us for those measures. Certainly we have not been antagonizing the bills of any other committee during this session. I have asked on several occasions to have bills taken up; but they have always been objected to and had to go over. Now I hope the Senate will agree to have a session on Monday night to consider bills from the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Monday the Senate will take a recess and sit in the evening to consider bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection?

Mr. BAYARD. Cannot that be decided on Monday? Why not leave decisions of that kind until Monday shall arrive? The course of business, as we all know, disappoints the expectation of many. Sometimes a bill is passed with very little debate; sometimes debate on it is very prolonged. It is quite impossible to prognosticate what the term of debate may be; and in this weather, with the amount of labor which is being bestowed by the Senate, I question very much whether it is well to have night sessions.

I will say in regard to the vote just taken, that it is well understood that to-morrow will be occupied by committee sessions, which will embrace the labors of almost every member of the body, and gentlemen feel, and feel very properly, the necessity of their presence in the Chamber pending the passage of measures, and are not willing to be absent. If I had been willing to be absent from the Chamber pending the consideration of public business, although my absence should be caused by devotion to committee duty elsewhere, I should not have voted for the adjournment until Monday. So in regard to the session on Monday night. We know the labors of Senators do not cease with their presence in the Chamber; that by night as well as day they are occupied, and occupied in respect of public business.

I hope, therefore, this proposition made now for a night session on Monday may be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore.. The Chair will remind the Senator from Delaware that no motion to that effect has been made. The Senator from Illinois did not make a motion.

Mr. BAYARD. I was under the impression that he had made such a motion. I assure him that I will facilitate, so far as my poor aid may do, his disposition to fulfill his duty as chairman of an important committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will also remind Senators that under a recent rule adopted at this session it will be in order on Monday at any time to move for a recess, which motion must be decided without debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I think I have been probably as modest as any Senator here in asking to take the time of the Senate for the committee of which I am chairman. I have been antagonized a good many times when I desired to get up bills; but that was perfectly natural, because every committee desires to get its business through. Each committee thinks, I presume, that its business is more important than the business of any other committee, and yielding to that idea I have yielded all the way through the session up to this time. I now give notice that I shall ask at every opportunity for this time to be given to the Military Committee. If I cannot have it, I shall certainly oppose giving it to any other committee; and I shall antagonize every committee in this Chamber on this question until the same privilege is given to the committee I represent as has been given to other committees.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 857) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the pending question is on the amendment in section 14, line 2, after the word "bind," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "not exceeding fifteen;" and at the end of the section to insert:

To those only who are employed by the department or who contribute information for the use of the department, and to each organized agricultural society, and also to each organized grange of the Patrons of Husbandry.

Mr. ANTHONY. I trust that will be voted down, and that we shall go back to the original proposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Oglesby, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Sprague, Tipton, West, and Windom—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Ingalls, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pease, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Washburn, and Wright—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Morton, Norwood, Schurz, Spencer, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—23.

So the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now I wish to offer an amendment, to come in as a new section.

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, at the request of the Secretary of War, to print and bind a number not exceeding two thousand copies of the annual report of the Chief Signal Officer for distribution by the Secretary of War.

This is the same as the other amendments of that class. The Signal Officer requires this.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have one other amendment, to come in on page 16, line 7.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island in regard to the amendment just adopted, what that signal report is. Is it the report about the weather?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. Those reports are printed daily. Why should we print two thousand copies?

Mr. ANTHONY. This is for the printing of the annual report. We print two thousand copies of the reports of several other Bureaus, and these are necessary for the Signal Officer to send to his correspondents. He has a great many correspondents who serve without any pay, and the only recognition they have of their services is that this report is sent to them; and he has written a letter to me requesting this number of copies to be distributed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to reconsider the last vote. I know the gentlemen who are at the head of Bureaus like to see what they write in print; but I think the Senate of the United States ought to judge of the utility of the report, and we should not involve the Government in the expense of printing two thousand copies of a report about which we do not know anything. If this report is of utility I am perfectly willing to vote to print it; but I will not vote for it merely because the Signal Officer desires it. I should like to hear my honorable friend from Rhode Island tell us the necessity for the preservation of such a document as that.

Mr. ANTHONY. This amendment has not been offered by the committee merely because the Signal Officer desired the report printed, but because in the opinion of the committee it was proper that the report should be printed. I consider that the reports of the Signal Office are among the most valuable contributions that the Departments make to the public interests. They have been of immense interest in the security of life upon the ocean and of immense interest to agriculture.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not doubt that, and we have those reports in printed form. If this report embodies any other information, I shall withdraw my objection. I only rose to inquire what this report was. If it is the mere daily report of the weather and of storms, the time having passed, it does not seem to me necessary to print it.

Mr. ANTHONY. O, no; the Senator misunderstands it.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is just what I want to understand.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is the report of the operations of the Bureau, and is intended as a guide for those who are making observations and improvements in meteorological science. I am quite sure the Senator from Kentucky will approve of it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in section 16, line 8, after the word "index" to insert—

And the said person shall be paid therefor such compensation or additional compensation as shall be just.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SARGENT. How does section 14 now stand? Has it been amended at all?

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the bill is read the third time I will move, at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to strike out the two sections which relate to the distribution of the pamphlet edition of the laws and of the bound edition of the Statutes at Large. I think myself the distribution of eleven thousand may be too large; and as the Committee on the Judiciary are now considering the subject of printing, publishing, and distributing the laws, which belongs to that committee rather than to the Committee on Printing, I will move that those sections be stricken from the bill, in order that the whole matter may be under the consideration of the Committee on the Judiciary. In the mean time the law remains precisely the same as it is in this bill, which is a mere codification of that part of the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to strike out the two sections indicated by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us know what those sections are.

Mr. ANTHONY. The fifth and sixth, relative to the distribution of the laws.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have the fourteenth section read.

Mr. ANTHONY. It stands as it stood originally in the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I move to strike out "twenty-five thousand" and insert "fifteen thousand," in line 2. I do not wish to debate it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope that will not be done.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this is the only way of distributing agricultural documents, it appears, according to the judgment of the Senate, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty;" so that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall have fifty thousand copies to distribute.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that will not be done. I do not see the use of our giving the heads of Departments power to distribute to whom they please all the public documents that are printed at public expense, while we are denying to ourselves the privilege of sending to our constituents a single Agricultural Report or anything else. I voted for the amendment to cut down the number to fifteen thousand. Now the proposition is to increase it to fifty thousand, and to place them at the disposal of one man to distribute as he pleases. While I have confidence in the Commissioner of Agriculture, still I do not propose that we shall print at the privilege of one man's distribution so many copies as that. I shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator from Delaware ought not to refuse to do good unto others because he cannot have good done unto himself. I think he ought to be willing that the people should have, certainly in each one of the States, some of the copies of this important report, enough to have one for a county if you please, even if members of Congress cannot have any at all. Therefore I move this amendment in order that the people of the whole United States may have distributed among them more copies of the Agricultural Report than this twenty-five thousand, which is a mere drop in the bucket. It makes it somewhat more equal, and it enables every neighborhood, so to speak, every township possibly—I think it might enable every township to have in its town library or somewhere accessible one copy of this book. It appears to me that objection ought not to be made to that.

Mr. BAYARD. I quite agree with the Senator from Vermont that twenty-five thousand copies of this work are a very small number for anything like a popular distribution in this country. I believe the customary number has been three hundred thousand. But this is an entirely new scheme of distribution. This bill provides in an earlier section for the publication perhaps of three hundred thousand copies, or of some number in the discretion of Congress, which are to be purchased by the citizens; so that we are now proposing to substitute a system of distribution, at cost, among the people, of this document, instead of a gratuitous distribution. One of the two principles, it seems to me, is correct. If the people are to buy this document at its cost price, and if it is decided that they shall pay for it, that, is to say, those who shall get it shall pay for it, that is well enough; but if you decide that to be so, why pursue the system of gratuitous distribution by a single officer according to his discretion?

The remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] this morning struck me as being entirely correct. He found fault with the reposal of this discretion as to who should receive these twenty-five or fifty thousand copies voted to a department, to a single officer. There is no propriety in that, and I think it would be unwise unless you should couple with the resolution to increase this number for gratuitous distribution some indication of the persons who shall receive it. If a provision were made that every public library, reading-room, and literary association organized in this way shall receive a copy of this report upon the address being sent to the Commissioner, we should have exercised some supervision over it and probably have done a wise thing in selecting bodies of that character.

But while I think that five or twenty-five thousand copies are much too small a number, and fifty thousand copies not at all too large, yet remember you are making a gratuitous distribution of them in the face of your new system of distributing them at cost price. If people want this document, under the second section of the bill they can get it at cost price; but others who do not choose to pay for it may apply to the head of the Agricultural Bureau, and in his discretion he may supply it to his friends and deny it to those whom he may not consider his friends. I do not think it would be proper to delegate that kind of discretion to him. If the matter of receiving these documents is to rest wholly in the individual discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture, I shall not vote to increase the number of copies, but rather to decrease it. If, on the contrary, it is to be accompanied by such an indication of the intent of the Senate as will secure an equitable distribution according to the ratio of population all over the country, I shall not object to seeing the number increased to what the Senator from Vermont has designated; but I do not think the Commissioner of Agriculture should have the distribution gratuitously of these fifty thousand copies when everybody else but his friends will have to pay for them.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not like the manner of distribution provided for by this bill, and I cannot understand what connection there is between the abolition of the franking privilege and the deprivation of the proper distribution of these documents by mail free. I know, and I presume every Senator knows, that this report is considered very valuable by the agricultural interest of our country. I know it has always been considered so in my State, and those who understand the subject and are practically engaged in agriculture seek after it greedily. We have been overburdened with letters for it. Many persons have not yet found out that we have not the power to distribute it.

The franking privilege was abolished; but that is no reason why the Agricultural Report should not go free by law as the Congressional Globe did, and as I believe the RECORD does now. Is there any reason why we should not have an envelope at the Government Printing Office stamped "Free by law: Agricultural Report?" Is there any reason why those documents should not be distributed with a little trouble from members of Congress to those who need them? Every member has a list of his constituents marked, some of them as mechanics, to whom the mechanical reports are sent; others as agriculturists, to whom he sends the Agricultural Report. It requires, to be sure, some little trouble on the part of members of Congress, but it is fully appreciated by the people.

When I heard in the course of the debate to-day the statement made that in repealing the franking privilege we had prevented the distribution of these documents to the people, I heard it with surprise. I voted for the repeal of the franking privilege. I did so because great abuses existed which could not be remedied. A Senator said in the course of the debate to-day that the repeal of the franking privilege amounted to nothing so far as private correspondence was concerned; that it was only in reference to the distribution of public documents that it was of any importance. But, Mr. President, it was well known, it was admitted in debate last year on all hands, that the abuse of the franking privilege for the distribution of political documents and other matter which was not fit to go in the mails at all had grown to such an excess that it ought to be stopped. It was stopped, and it was wisely stopped. The only way that the evil could be cured at that time was by tearing it up by the roots, and it was done. But, sir, there never was anything in that bill, nor in the principle which I avowed at that time, which prevents me from distributing Agricultural Reports among my constituents free by mail.

I shall vote to print three hundred thousand copies of this report. I do not like the principle of the bill, not only in reference to the manner of distribution, but in reference to printing copies to be sold. I think that is a miserable business for the Government to engage in. It is the people's money that prints these documents, and if they are distributed to them you are simply sending them the book which they have already bought, for you have printed the book with their money raised by taxation. To require the charging of a few shillings backward and forward in the mails simply for the convenience of being able to say that it did not cost so much to print these documents, that the people helped pay for them, seems to me to be very small and very absurd. I am in favor, and if I had any hope it would pass, if it did not seem to me hopeless inasmuch as this bill is supported by so many Senators who have considered it, I should offer an amendment, and should gladly vote for it, to raise the number of the Agricultural Report to three hundred thousand copies and to authorize them to go free, as the Congressional Globe did, by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be great force in what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] said about the philosophy of this bill if it were to be applied to the whole bill, and we were to vote down the whole bill upon the ground that it undertook to do two opposite and contradictory things; that is to declare, in the first place, in effect, that the people should not have these public documents, and, in the next place, that the various heads of Departments should, to distribute among their friends. I am not speaking about the bill, but taking the bill as it is, I say, if the Commissioner of Agriculture, for instance, is going to distribute twenty-five thousand copies of the report on agriculture among the people who will make the best use of them, as the phrase used to be in another part of the Capitol, "where they will do the most good" my friend [Mr. ANTHONY] suggests is the proper word—then I say that the more of these you print in respect to agriculture particularly, which is the most complicated science that I know anything about, and which is the least studied, and of which there is really the least known, the more you can distribute of these documents, just as the more you can distribute of the Bible, the better it will be for the community. Somebody will get them; and I suppose if the Commissioner of Agriculture does his duty—and I assume he would endeavor to do it; I have no reason to suppose he would not—and has fifty thousand copies to distribute, he would send them to all the public libraries and town libraries and institutions of that kind in the United States, and then the citizens of those particular towns would be able to see this one copy. Then any citizen seeing that copy and its value would be told, "You can get a copy to carry home to your farm and keep it there by just writing to the Congressional Printer and sending him so many cents." Then the people would have a specimen everywhere, in every part of the country, of this document, and they could judge whether it was worth sending for or not. They would get the information at the libraries, and if they wanted a copy for themselves they could have it, just as in the Congressional Library we find copies of books that are just printed, or rare books, as the case may be; we see them, we think we want a copy ourselves of that book although we have read that one, and then we go and buy it.

I think that is not an improper expenditure of public money. I cannot assume that the Commissioner of Agriculture is going to make a holocaust of these fifty thousand copies and burn them up simply for the sake of seeing the smoke. I must assume that this gentleman, whatever his faults may be—and I think he has some; there are few people out of this Chamber who have not—will send this document to the various public libraries in the towns of this country. It would give on a rough computation about four or five copies to a township in the whole United States, if you have fifty thousand copies. That will do some good; and in order to do that good I submit this motion. I do not desire to take up time in talking about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to reduce the number from twenty-five thousand to fifteen thousand. Consequently I shall vote against the amendment of my colleague to increase the amount up to fifty thousand. What will be the effect of this proposition? It will merely give the Commissioner of Agriculture an opportunity to distribute these fifty thousand copies to whoever may call for them here. The whole fifty thousand may disappear and not a single copy be sent abroad. I think that if our constituents at home are compelled to pay the cost price of these documents, the Commissioner should not have power to make a gratuitous distribution to all the comers who may happen in at his Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the Senate will finally put this section——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to read a substitute that I propose to offer for the section?

Mr. BOUTWELL. As I propose to move an amendment to the section myself, I would prefer to go on.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Senator will allow me, I will read what I intend to propose:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind three hundred thousand copies of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for distribution; one hundred thousand for the use of the Senate, and two hundred thousand for the use of the House of Representatives; and that the said reports be sent free of postage through the mails, being properly designated on the outside envelopes.

I propose to offer that as a substitute for the whole of the fourteenth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend by striking——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order until the vote is taken on my amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only gave way to the Senator from Kentucky to have his amendment read, not to make a motion to amend. I was about to say that I have hopes that the Senate will place the section in regard to the report on agriculture in precisely the same position that the other documents stand.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] some time since expressed his opinion that the number should be increased to fifty thousand, and coupled with it an observation which then arrested my attention and brought to my recollection two or three opportunities that I have had to observe the manner in which things have been done since the franking privilege was abolished. His remark suggests to me the opening of a new process to which I wish to call attention in the beginning before many steps have been taken; and that is this: If the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont be adopted, we shall have a new franking privilege which in time will be odious to the people and exceedingly disagreeable to the parties who participate in it. When the Department of Agriculture has fifty thousand copies of the report to distribute, and members of Congress receive applications from their constituents, those applications will be transferred in the very nature of the case to the Department of Agriculture, and the franking privilege instead of being an equal privilege will be an unequal privilege seized upon by the most greedy for the use of the public money to the extent of about one dollar for every document distributed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Massachusetts says that my amendment will introduce a new species of franking privilege. I wish to ask him whether the fourteenth section is not obnoxious in principle to precisely the same novelty?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am about to offer a proposition to the Senate for the purpose of obviating the difficulty which exists in the section as it stands now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then do not accuse me of the introduction of a novelty.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, sir, I will only impute to the Senator from Vermont the capacity and the disposition to improve upon a proposition which in itself is a very bad proposition and calculated to introduce, or to perpetuate what has been already introduced, a custom by which members of Congress through the Departments to a certain extent secure the benefit of the franking privilege without its observation by the country.

We have ingrafted upon the twelfth and thirteenth sections of this bill provisions by which the franking privilege, either directly or indirectly exercised and enjoyed, has been prohibited, and we propose with reference to the Department of Agriculture to establish or permit an indirect system of franking which will be odious to the people and exceedingly discreditable to the members of Congress, who by the course of events will be made the unwilling instruments of its exercise. Now, what ought we do with reference to the Agricultural Report? Place it where we have placed every other report. Let those who desire it and who have no right to receive it free by reason of official position pay for it and pay for the cost of transporting it. I propose, therefore, to change this section in this way: After the word "bind," in the second line, insert the words "not exceeding fifteen thousand copies;" and at the end of the section add "to the officers of the Department and to those who contribute information for the use of the Department."

I am not sure whether that amendment is in order now, because I have not followed the course of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) Does the Senator move that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose I cannot move it until the amendment of the Senator from Vermont has been disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty."

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 12.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to ask three minutes of the attention of the Senate to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, who says I am aiding a bad proposition and am committing a fraud on the abolition of the franking privilege law. I do not take it in any invidious sense. Does not the Senator know—of course he does—that every one of the provisions of this bill and every one of the provisions of the abolition of the franking privilege law except the word "repeal," was a fraud upon the franking law as it stood before? We said "the franking privilege is abolished," and then we said that every officer of the Government of the United States connected with any of the Departments, through its head, might frank as much as he had a mind to do, and that the Government would furnish him with stamps to frank with; that instead of being obliged to write his name, which was some security against fraud, they would furnish him with stamps ad libitum, which should be put on by the clerks in his Department who had charge of sending out documents and papers, and then they should go. The net result, therefore, to the tax-payers was that instead of forcing Senators and Secretaries to write their names as evidence that the document was to go free, the United States had to pay the engraver, the printer, and the counter of stamps a few thousand or a hundred thousand dollars a year, as the case might be, to do the franking of the Departments.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That was done when the Senator was here, and I was not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it was; but the Senator was in another place, where, as I say, Senators and Secretaries together contrived the law in such a way that instead of the abolition of the franking privilege being a benefit to the people, it was a positive tax upon the Treasury.

Mr. WEST. In what respect?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Excuse me for one moment. And all this was done under the delusion that the Postmaster-General created here, by himself, as I believe, violating the law in sending out printed advertisements or contrivances all over the country to get names praying us to abolish the franking privilege, which went free through the mails both ways. That was what created what we thought was a public sentiment in order that we might abolish this great abuse; and now you turn around in the same breath and say, it is not in fact and in truth abolished as to anybody except the Senator or member of Congress who is to receive a petition from his constituent or is to inform his constituent that his petition has been received. That must be paid for in an actual stamp bought with the Senator's money or with the constituent's money; but when you go to all these Departments, every Secretary is provided with the means of franking just as before, only at a little less inconvenience to himself, and a little greater expense to the tax-payer. That is the reform which the honorable Senator stands up to vindicate as being so pleasant to the palates of the people.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have never vindicated the abolition of the franking privilege; but while the franking privilege is nominally abolished or abolished by law, I wish to have the policy of the Government conform to its abolition. Then we shall get a public sentiment either for the change or for a restoration of the franking privilege in some form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, we got the public sentiment before. We advertised for it. We sent from the Post-Office Department a circular to every postmaster, which was as binding upon us as a command to pay an assessment for the salvation of the Republic I suppose, commanding him to get names and send them back; and we did that at the public expense, so far as the transmission of such things through the mails can be said to be at the public expense. And now the Senator says he does not wish to advocate the abolition of the franking privilege, but only to stick to the virtue of the law as it exists. My answer so that is what I have already stated, that the law as it exists is a tham and a fraud. You tell the people now that everything sent through the mail pays. You tell them a falsehood. Nothing sent through the mails by public officers pays except that which Senators and members of Congress send and receive. Everything sent by the Departments is sent just as it was before, without being paid for, except that the tax-payers are forced to pay a large number of thousands of dollars a year to relieve the men who before were obliged to put their names upon documents from the trouble of doing it. That is just the simple truth, and there is not any good object that I know of in disguising it. There cannot be any dispute about it.

That being the state of the case, I propose that the agricultural people whom in part I represent shall have the advantage in proportion to their numbers (and I would go for the commercial people whom the Senator represents just as well) of some real benefit from this sham, by requiring the Commissioner of Agriculture to send to the various public libraries and places where things of that kind can be of common benefit to a little community these reports, which are only printed at all, as I suppose, in order that some valuable information may be made known and diffused among men. If that is so, let them go.

The Senator says this is out of proportion. I find that three thousand copies of the annual report on commerce and navigation, to which he has made no exception, are to be furnished for distribution by the Secretary of the Treasury. The agriculturists of this country are in greater numbers than fifty is to three, compared with the commercial classes of this country. There are more than fifty farmers to three merchants and traders in the United States. It may have escaped the observation of my honorable friend, but I think not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It has not; and another thing has not escaped my observation, although it has that of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate has already agreed to an amendment of that section by which the distribution is limited to the officers of the Treasury Department, and none to be given to merchants and traders. That is what I want to do in regard to the Agricultural Report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes it so much worse. It must be of infinite advantage to commerce and the commercial traders of the United States to have the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency and so on in that Department have the advantage of all the information about commerce that has been collected at the people's expense in a given year and deny all of it to the rest of mankind. They having their salaries, which the people have not, are to have it free, but the people cannot get it. Mr. President, if that is not good government and retrenchment for you, I do not understand what reform is. We are to reform in the direction of denying to the tax-payer any information about his government or about his business; but the man who is in office shall have his documents free for his use and for the use of those whom he employs. I do not believe in that. I believe in these officers having the necessary books; but I believe that there is no distinction between their having them and their being properly distributed among the communities who are interested not in the personal sense, but in the governmental sense, to know what is going on at the seat of government, and what progress the Government is making in respect to the various interests that it has in charge. That is my position; and having thus defended it, I think the Senate will not misunderstand me in making this motion to increase this number of documents, so that every town in the United States may have two or three copies of them.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) If I was certain that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont was, as the Senator from Massachusetts declares, a fraud upon the action of Congress in abolishing the franking privilege, I should be more in favor of it than I am now.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not use the word "fraud."

Mr. CARPENTER. That is what it meant in plain Saxon. That is what he would have said if he had thought of it, I suppose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am glad you know.

[Mr. CARPENTER addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, we have been told, and well told, by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin one side of the story and but one side; and in doing so I do not think that he spoke very complimentarily of his own constituents or the constituents of us all at large throughout this Union.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and surely upon the same principle I should oppose the amendment proposed in the second instance by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. Upon principle originally I should have favored five hundred thousand; but when you speak of twenty-five thousand or fifty thousand, if you propose to reach all the agriculturists you will fail; and likewise with three hundred thousand. Therefore you will be invidious under any circumstances upon that line.

But the idea has been ably enforced that there was fraud and imposition upon the part of the Postmaster-General and the recipients of his circulars throughout the United States who procured signatures upon the petitions he sent out. To say the least of it, that does not reflect anything to their credit. They certainly were not competent to look to the facts pertaining to the subject. Sufficient it is to say that if they were entrapped the petitions came here and their demands were potent, for they prompted the Senate to do that which they would not otherwise have done.

But, sir, what is the fact pertaining to that question? We are not admonished satisfactorily that they were improperly actuated, because we have seen no petition. I have received none; I recollect of no petition having been presented here by any Senator asking that the franking privilege should be restored. The first argument that I ever made in the Senate of the United States was against the abolition of the franking privilege. I was opposed to it. I thought the people ought to have the information as is well said here; but the demands were such that it was repealed and I have heard no complaint on the subject from the voters of this mighty Union demanding its restoration. I should be slow for one to advocate a restoration until they do make that demand. Let them do so or state that they were imposed on, if you like. I say they have not been. Our action may have been on an ex parte showing, and it is very true that it was; but the people were not imposed upon. They ought to have looked to their interests before they were thus caught if they were; but they cannot afford to put in that plea, nor do I think that any Senator is authorized to do so for them because it is not complimentary to them. Let them demand a restoration and no man will more readily vote for it than I will; but until they do so I shall continue to do as I have done heretofore, take it for granted that they asked in good faith for the abolition of the franking privilege. I responded to it as such, and I recollect when I was about to give my vote finally on that subject I stated that at an early day a mighty cry would come up broadcast from this nation asking a restoration. Up to this time it has not come, but I see evidences here that it will come because many will indorse the speech of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin and the effort of my friends from Vermont, from Kentucky, from Georgia, and elsewhere here; but "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I shall wait for my part until they make the demand. I am not going to force it upon them. I felt they were wrong when they asked the abolition. Now let them find that they were in error, and when they find themselves in error let them ask to be benefited and I shall respond to it. Until that time let them do without the Agricultural Report, if you please. I know it is a valuable document. Every farmer in the broad Union ought to be in possession of it. Many of them would be much benefited by it; but they are not demanding it except in the old way. I receive letters regularly from various grangers. Why, say they "give me the amount of books that belong to me for my organization." I have not sent to any single one of them a response in any way, manner, or shape, because if they are as ignorant as they have shown themselves to be let them work out of it; I am not able to teach them. I am certainly not going into my purse to do so. I have not been broken down on any vote that I have given yet upon back salary or anything of that kind. I am not responding to them. I am not going to pull out my own money and use it broadcast in distributing public documents. If the people demand me to do thus and so, I recognize their right and I respond to them; but when I have acted in accord with their request and demand, I am not going to be so active at my advanced age as to turn about and spend my money without any consideration. Whenever they demand these books properly and say they have been mistaken and want the repeal of the act abolishing the franking privilege, I will give it back to them. Until they do I shall not vote for an additional number to what has been proposed by the committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is an amendment now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) An amendment is pending.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish to propose an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will read for information what I wish to propose:

Provided, That all documents printed by order of Congress and all mail matter shall pass free through the mails when sent by the President, heads of Departments, or members of Congress.

That amendment will test the position of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. STOCKTON. The amendment which has just been read, I understand for information, is really a caricature——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that that amendment is not in order. It was only read for information.

Mr. STOCKTON. I understand that. I was not going to speak on that amendment or the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. I was merely about to say that the amendment just read I understand not to be in order, but to be simply a caricature on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I stated before the Senator from Kentucky suggested his amendment that such an amendment would be an improvement. I have heard nothing since to change my mind. The amendment which has just been read for information provides that all mail matter shall go free, which is simply an absurd proposition, which there is no use of wasting words upon.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky proposes that, like the Congressional Globe, the Agricultural Report shall be printed as it used to be, in large numbers and circulated. I said that there was no reason why that should not be done because the franking privilege has been abolished.

The Senator from Wisconsin in addressing the Chair I think was not logical. The Senator from Wisconsin said that he had to work at nights to send documents off, he had to work hard to send them off; but the people did not seem to appreciate them and they wanted the privilege abolished because they would not trust the Senate and could not trust members of Congress, but could trust the Public Printer.

Mr. President, I insist that that is not the logical deduction from what was done. There is no Senator who does not know that the franking privilege was abused. It was abused not because Senators could not be trusted, not because members of Congress could not be trusted; it was abused because by a long custom dating back for years and years it came to be considered that members could be called upon to frank documents for political and other purposes which were not contemplated by the law. It was not an act of individual dishonor to any Senator. When I first came to the Senate I was appealed to to frank political documents as others were. I could see nothing in the law authorizing it and I declined to do it. From that time on, I always wished and hoped that the law would be made plain so that we should all understand what was meant by it. I made many political enemies by refusing to allow my frank to be used on political documents. There was another construction given by other gentlemen, I have no doubt in perfect good faith, and many and many people thought that that man who belonged to a political party and would not assist it in distributing documents with his frank was doing a wrong and a bad thing. It was that system, not the conduct of any individual, to which I allude; it was a bad system and it had to be broken down. But now we have no right to say to the people, "Because you wanted that thing broken down you cannot have your public documents." We have no right to say "You shall not have an Agricultural Report until you give us back the franking privilege," which is in effect what is said by the language used in this debate—not intended, of course, I know, but that is the effect of it; and the few remarks I made a few moments ago were to that point.

It is not logical; it is not true. There is no reason why the people should not have the documents which they desire and which we publish under our responsibility, to give them the information they want, we being the judges of it after hearing from them and seeing them. There is no reason why the documents should not be sent free through the mails. It is no reason why they should not be published by the Government and sent without charge to the people.

If this bill goes through as it is, there is a certain number of copies of the Agricultural Report, twenty-five thousand I think, to be given away; then another larger number which are to be sold. Where will the documents go that are given away? Will they not go into the hands of men who will seek to get them to sell again, and will not your twenty-five thousand become a lot of documents to be put into the market and held, so that when the Government has exhausted its supply, in old shops you will find them hidden away, the very documents you have given away, and sold at extraordinary and extravagant prices to the people who cannot get them from the Government. The system is vicious in that respect. There is no reason whatever, as I said before, why we should adopt a principle of this kind, no reason why these documents cannot be distributed just as they were before. All that is necessary is that some proper officer certify "this is a public document."

I am willing to avoid the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin when on the floor and to free myself from any such idea as that I am going on the principle that I will not trust Senators. I should be perfectly willing that the Senator himself and the members of Congress to whom these documents are sent should have the power of passing them free by writing "Agricultural Report" with their own name under it; but that labor had better be saved. It might be done by the gentleman who has charge of the document-room. He might have a stamp, and when these reports come in he could stamp them "Agricultural Report: free by law." Then these documents can be taken to your room and you direct them to the persons who are agriculturists and who have written to you for these reports.

This is so plain to my mind that I cannot see how Senators can differ with me on the question. My whole object is that the public documents shall be printed free, shall be distributed free, but that we do not again introduce the system which invites politicians and other parties to misuse the power which was called the franking privilege. I would trust to the honor of any Senator to send nothing through the mail but a public document when he is asked to write on a document "Agricultural Report" and sign his name. It is not therefore because we will not trust Senators, it is not because we will not trust members of Congress; it is because we ought by law to provide that nothing shall go through the mail free except such matters as are printed at the request of our constituents for their good and are public documents.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, may I appeal to Senators now to give us a vote on this question. The discussion has taken a very wide range and far out of the original purpose of the bill. The bill has been framed merely to codify existing statutes and to make some changes that are in the direction of the sense of the Senate, as repeatedly expressed during this session. I hope we shall have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read, so that we shall all understand what we are voting upon.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 14, line 2, it is proposed to strike out "twenty-five thousand" and insert "fifty thousand."

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] Were he present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sprague, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Flanagan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, and Windom—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Pease, Schurz, Spencer, Stewart, Thurman, Washburn, and West—24.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. I now offer my substitute——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is now the pending question. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out in line 2, section 14, the word "twenty-five" and insert "not exceeding fifteen," and at the end of the section to insert "to the officers of the department and to those who contribute information for the use of the department."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts to explain to us whether he means by the words "those who contribute information for the use of the department" its regular agents in the various counties; or does he mean the authors of works on agriculture who supply that department with considerable of the information that is contained in the reports?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let the section in the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind twenty-five thousand copies of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like the Clerk to read the substitute which I propose to offer when the section is amended.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. STEVENSON, as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind three hundred thousand copies of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture for distribution; one hundred thousand for the use of the Senate and two hundred thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and that the said report be sent free of postage through the mails upon being properly designated on the outer envelope.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will vote for that amendment if I cannot do any better, but I desire to offer a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to offer it; but it can be read for information.

Mr. MERRIMON. I send my proposed amendment to the desk to be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

That each Senator and member of the House of Representatives shall have the same number and kind of books and documents now allowed by law to each; and that the franking privilege be, and the same is hereby, restored, so far only as to allow Senators and members of the House of Representatives to send such books and documents to the people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now I offer my amendment as a substitute for the fourteenth section:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer to print and bind three hundred thousand copies of the annual report of the Department of Agriculture for distribution; one hundred thousand for the use of the Senate and two hundred thousand for the use of the House of Representatives, and that the said report be sent free of postage through the mails upon being properly designated on the outer envelope.

I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate, exhausted as it is, by any remarks on the bill or my substitute for the fourteenth section. I wish the question distinctly met whether we are going to distribute these Agricultural Reports among the people for whom they were intended, or whether we shall just abolish the whole business. There are some six or seven million farmers in this country. They are the great producers in the land. Agriculture is the great source of our wealth.

I insist that this substitute is no side-way restitution of the franking privilege. I undertake to say that for years the Congressional Globe was sent just as it is proposed to send this document, with nothing upon it except "Congressional Globe" and a reference to the act of Congress directing that it should be sent free. Then every farmer will get this document, one of great value. I am in favor myself of letting all have it, and I would go for a greater number even than that which I have proposed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that he make his proposition one hundred and seventy-five thousand for the House and twenty-five thousand for the Commissioner, for the very purposes which have been indicated by the debate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I except to that modification. We shall then meet this question fairly. Either give up printing this report, or print a sufficient number to do good. My constituents have not as much ready money as those of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. They are taxed, heavily taxed; they contribute largely to the support of this Government; and all that they ask is that they shall be able from the reading of this report to make advances in this great science which he himself admits lies at the foundation of all our wealth. I say that they ought not to be taxed again for giving them this book. I shall either vote to reduce this to the smallest number, or to make it large enough to reach the ends for which this Bureau was established and for which this report has been always printed. We shall then have a fair test. Upon the substitue I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let the amendment be read as modified.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to make a suggestion to my colleague and to the Senator from Kentucky. I think it is very proper that twenty-five thousand should be given to the Commissioner of Agriculture——

Mr. STEVENSON. I agree to all that, and I propose seventy-five thousand for the Senate, two hundred thousand for the House, and twenty-five thousand for the Commissioner.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to inquire of the committee having this bill in charge what provision is made in the bill now for the sale and distribution of the Agricultural Report outside of the twenty-five thousand provided for distribution by the Commissioner of Agriculture? I make this inquiry for the purpose of enabling me to determine how I shall vote upon the pending proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not see the chairman of the committee in, but I understand the provision of the bill to be that these reports will be sent on being prepaid the postage and the expense of the book.

Mr. PRATT. But how is the number to be printed to be determined?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. By the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. PRATT. The work is stereotyped then.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to say that I think the time is hardly yet come for a restoration of the franking privilege. It may come after there shall have been some experience of the stringency caused by the abolition, and after some experience pointing out to us what books we ought to print and how many; but until it does come I shall vote against all propositions for restoring it in shreds and patches. Let us have either the system of printing books and having the people pay for them, or the franking privilege or something equivalent to it restored in full vigor, one or the other.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I think that is rather an indirect attack upon this amendment. In the first place, a restoration of the franking privilege he knows would not be in order. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall vote against me. He no doubt will represent his constituency in their desire not to get this document, or they may have money enough to pay for it. That is a very fair and legitimate question. He certainly has a right to vote against it and will do so; but do not let him say that it is an indirect attempt to restore the franking privilege in face of the fact which he knows as well as anybody else that the Congressional Globe was distributed after the franking privilege was abolished.

Mr. SCOTT. Not now.

Mr. STEVENSON. Not now; but it was done, and it was done outside of the franking privilege. I undertake to say to the Senator that the sending of the Congressional Globe was not connected with the franking privilege. That was under an independent statute upon the statute-book, and you might as well have said that that was the franking privilege. I say it was an independent statute which authorized the Congressional Globe to go without franking. I propose just the same thing with the Agricultural Report.

Mr. CONKLING. That statute did require that the book should be labeled as the Senator's amendment provides here.

Mr. STEVENSON. Precisely. I took the amendment from the statute, which is on the statute-book, and therefore it is not just to say that this is an attempt to restore the franking privilege; not that I am not in favor of the franking privilege. I voted against the repeal; I will vote for its restoration. I regard it as lying at the foundation-stone of free government and cordially assent to all that was so well expressed by the President of the Senate in what he said. I think it a bad day for a free government when its representative assembly shall undertake to keep from the eyes of the people the great transactions which occur here. But that has nothing to do with this debate. The simple question is, if we have an agricultural Bureau, if we avail ourselves of the progress of agriculture, who is to be benefited by it? Only the men who can afford to send here money to get the report, while the great body of the tax-payers who support this Government are not to have the privilege unless they can afford to pay for it? I am opposed to that principle, and I am opposed to letting any head of a Bureau be the sole distributor to those who need the documents, to decide upon the persons to whom they shall be sent.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that if that is the object he must enlarge the number.

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, I will take this number. We got along very well with about this number for many years, and heard no great complaint. Half a loaf is better than no bread.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to appeal to my friend from Kentucky to allow an amendment so as to embrace the Patent Office report.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think that would be in order. We are now upon this particular subject. I do not believe there are any Patent Office reports published. I do not want to embarrass this bill. I have no object except to bring the question to a practical test.

Mr. MERRIMON. The mechanics of the country are interested in the Patent Office report, as much so as the farmers in the Agricultural Report. I have as much demand from mechanics for the mechanical report as for the Agricultural Report from farmers.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from North Carolina makes a very pertinent suggestion. He makes one which proposes to send the publication which is now made of the proceedings in the Patent Office, the Official Gazette, free to the mechanics of the country. That is now sent out, not in the old form of the Patent Office report, but upon payment by the mechanics of the country for that very publication by subscription.

So far as the distinction made by my friend from Kentucky between this proposition of his and the franking privilege as illustrated by sending through the mail free the old Congressional Globe is concerned, it is only in name. It is the free transmission through the mails of documents printed by public authority, whether sent by virtue of one statute or another. The mode of sending, whether the name is required to be upon the address as "public document" or not, makes no difference whatever. One statute authorized the sending out of the Congressional Globe; other statutes authorized the franking of letters and public documents; and I see no distinction when it comes to sending the documents free through the mails, whether you call it the franking privilege or the sending of public documents by virtue of a statute. It is for that reason that I say I am unwilling to begin by discriminating and restoring this free transmission of public documents through the mails in shreds and patches. Let us have it all one way or all the other.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am astonished that so clear-headed a speaker and thinker as we all acknowledge the Senator from Pennsylvania to be should fall into that error. He says there is no distinction. He knows very well that the franking privilege was subject to great abuse. This cannot be subject to any. He knows very well that if the Congressional Globe had been permitted to stand and be sent free through the mail, it could not be subject to the great abuse that led to the abolition of the franking privilege. Now, I ask the Senator to tell me what abuse is it to let the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD go free—to let the Agricultural Report go free? There are a great many useless books published that I would not send free, but these are two absolutely essential sources of information to the people. Their value and their benefit are admitted. They are placed on a footing where they cannot be abused. The franking privilege was subject to a great many abuses. I do not think this is a restoration of the franking privilege, and I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. ALCORN. I may be pardoned for venturing at this time to speak on the subject before the Senate, but I rise for information. Will some Senator show me wherein the Government is to lose one single cent by permittingthe Agricultural Reports to go through the mails free? Is there a loss of one single cent to accrue to any Department of the Government or to the people of the nation? Is it to increase the mail service of the Government to the extent of one single farthing? It is not. I answer the question myself; it is not. Then what is the proposition here, and why do Senators stickle upon this question of sending the Agricultural Reports through the mail free? It is a bare proposition as to whether you will tax the people for the benefit of the Government, those who receive the Agricultural Report, or whether you will permit them to receive it without charge. Do we desire now to raise revenue by means like this? Does it not come down to that point at last, that it is simply a question in regard to raising a revenue in the form of a three-cent or a five-cent stamp on each Agricultural Report?

There are in this country two million six hundred and odd thousand farmers, and these farmers who sit at the sources of the wealth of this nation come here asking that this information, which they in truth provide for through their representatives, which the Government pays for, shall be distributed back to them; and now Senators here arise and say they shall not have it unless they pay for it. I hold that they are entitled to receive it without pay. I shall vote to permit them to have it without pay, and in so voting I vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is evident this bill cannot be brought to a close to-night. It is now nearly six o'clock. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope we shall finish this bill. I am sure nobody else can make a speech. We have heard everything about every subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now let us have the vote without any more debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. On this question I suppose I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] He would probably vote "nay." I should vote "yea."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 34, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Windom, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Clayton, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Stewart, and Washburn—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, and West—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer the amendment I sent to the table a moment ago to come in as a new section after section 2.

Mr. ANTHONY. After the vote just taken I certainly think a question of this magnitude should be decided in a full Senate, and although I am exceedingly anxious to dispose of the bill, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator to allow me to move to take up the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I prefer to stick to my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 5, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL.

Mr. HURLBUT. I observe that the Journal states that before the previous question was seconded on the bill in relation to the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River leave was granted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to submit an amendment. Now, my recollection, supported by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is that the gentleman from Ohio asked leave to introduce an amendment which he had neither written out nor printed, and that I stated in the words which appear in the RECORD that I would allow the gentleman's amendment to be read, but did not say that I would accept it. I inquired of the gentleman what the purport of his amendment was. He told me what he proposed it should be, and said he desired to offer it as a substitute in case these bills failed.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is certainly mistaken in the first part of his statement. I asked leave without conditions to offer an amendment and have it considered pending to the bill. I said that I had not yet drawn it, but would draw it. That amendment I have drawn, and I understand of course it is pending. And how an amendment can be offered as a substitute to come in if the bills fail I do not see; for if they fail there is nothing pending. I do not care as to the particular method of getting at the amendment, but the amendment I certainly consider as pending, having been admitted by general consent. The conversation between the gentleman and myself to which he alludes occurred subsequently.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's understanding was in accordance with what appears on the Journal. But the gentleman having charge of the bill says that he did not admit the amendment, and his remarks as they appear in the RECORD seem to indicate that he did not admit it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. Whether the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has an amendment pending.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I stood near my colleague, [Mr. HURLBUT,] where I am standing now, and I noticed particularly at the time that he said, "I yield to have the amendment read." I know nothing as to the nature of the gentleman's amendment.

The SPEAKER. There need be no difficulty about this matter. If the House comes to a vote on seconding the previous question the gentleman from Ohio can have his amendment read, and if the House does not second the previous question the gentleman from Ohio will be recognized and can have his amendment admitted.

Mr. GARFIELD. The previous question was ordered last night.

The SPEAKER. But it can be reconsidered by a majority vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only consented to the arrangement on the understanding that my amendment was in.

The SPEAKER. Obviously the gentleman from Ohio must see that there was a misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I see it from the statement he has made.

The SPEAKER. And the RECORD bears him out, although the Chair's recollection was in accordance with what appears on the Journal.

The Journal was corrected, and was then approved.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed as managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1875, Mr. WHEELER of New York, Mr. MARSHALL of Illinois, and Mr. LOWNDES of Maryland.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SWANN. I rise to move concurrence in the amendment of the Senate to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment. In accordance with the precedents of the House, I presume the House would like to hear read a telegram which has just been received from Oregon. It was the custom in former days to read such telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I demand the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the subject?

The SPEAKER. The telegram itself is likely to tell the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] did not use to object to the reading of such telegrams.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know what the telegram is, but I wish the House to go on with the public business.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope it will be read. It may give some comfort to gentlemen who need it.

Several members demanded the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2453) to amend an act to revise and consolidate and amend the laws relating to pensions, approved March 3, 1873, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PRATT, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. HAMILTON of Texas as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SWANN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the bill (H. R. No. 3095) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, with the amendments of the Senate; and to move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. SWANN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent of the House for the passage of a bill regulating the admission of articles for exhibition at the centennial exhibition.

The bill was read for information. It provides that all articles which shall be imported for the sole purpose of exhibition at the international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia in the year 1876 shall be admitted without payment of duty or customs fees or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. All such articles as shall be sold in the United States or withdrawn for consumption therein at any time after such importation are to be subject to the duties imposed on like articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation, and in case any articles imported under the provisions of the act shall be withdrawn for consumption or sold without the payment of duties as required by law, all the penalties prescribed by the revenue laws are to be applied and enforced against such articles and against the person who may be guilty of such withdrawing or sale.

Mr. MCCRARY. I make no objection to anything which will not cause delay.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No 3601) received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

On motion of Mr. HERNDON, by unanimous consent, the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds, and asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3602) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas F. Fauntleroy, a citizen of Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman to allow me to insert as an amendment to the bill the name of Dr. Charles H. Williamson, of Portsmouth, Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. I will accept that amendment.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) was passed.

COUPLING OF CARS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred with an accompanying petition to the Committee on Railways and Canals:

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill regulating the mode of coupling cars and running railroads so as to prevent, if possible, the great loss of life caused by the present mode of procedure.

DEVELOPMENT OF MINING RESOURCES.

Mr. LOWE. I ask unanimous consent to have considered at this time the bill (H. R. No. 2032) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872.

The bill was read for information.

Mr. STORM. I object.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The regular order of business being demanded, the House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3342) for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River, upon which Mr. MCCRARY was entitled to the floor for half an hour.

Mr. MCCRARY. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CROCKER.]

Mr. CROCKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise first in behalf of the National Board of Trade, of which I am a member. This Board at their autumn meeting last past in the city of Chicago, discussed fully the question of removing the bar at the mouth of the Mississippi River, passing upon it, as imperative and controlling, to be the bounden duty of the Government of the United States. This, Mr. Speaker, is one of those self-evident propositions which any man of common sense can hardly question. One is lost in the contemplation of what that valley is to be, with almost half of our population now, with twenty-one growing States, seven Territories, and more to come.

Where is our equilibrium and where are these States and Territories going to land? God in His wisdom has so made this continent, that it is not susceptible of division, diverse as our pursuits now are or may hereafter be. We cannot divide our Mississippi, or other noble rivers. "Mason and Dixon" is a myth of the past. Sir, we are one family, large, I confess, but one family we must be. Our popular institutions, ever developing our broad land from shore to shore, from center to circumference, until at last we are molded together, not only by the ties of interest, but consanguinity and fraternity, never to be severed, "one and indivisible." Sir, I yesterday heard of a South, sometimes coupled with a West, as if there were no East or North. Has the compass lost its attraction to the north pole? And is there no North, no East? Have they not also the same vital interests that the South, or even the West has? If you open the Mississippi, open it effectually. Are we of the North and East to be shut out and not to use it, or reap the benefits of its competition with the iron rail in cheapening transportation? Heaven forbid; it cannot be. Sir, I repeat once more, we are one. When calamity reaches the South, are we not one? If the waters cover the South, is the East, ay, is Massachusetts and New England laggard, cold, or stolid, indifferent to her calamities?

Did Boston, the pride of New England, after the loss of one hundred millions by fire, hold back? Are we not ready to share what God in His mercy has given us? Ay, sir; say not South, or West. So long as our glorious inland seas from the cold Superior to Ontario lave our northern shores, or the roar of Niagara's cataract is heard to heaven, or the stormy Atlantic billow roar's its requiem upon the rock-bound shores of New England; so long as the electric wire from our shores under its bed, three thousand miles away, clicks the business throb of a great country, so throbs the heart of our people from every State in our Union. Touch Louisiana or California or any other State with distress and suffering, and you touch the East and North.

But enough of this. I now come to the question of the two systems, each advocated so ably, to remove obstacles in developing our commerce. I confess to be in doubt. I acknowledge my indebtedness both to the majority and minority bills and reports, both aiming at the same grand object. I shall offer no amendment; but what I would prefer is that some number not exceeding ten should be selected from the Mississippi Valley, of its practical and sound men, by the Speaker and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, to serve without pay, save expenses, with power to call upon Army or civil engineers for any facts they may desire to develop, to the end of making up a clear judgment, to be rendered on or before the 1st of October ensuing, and to be conclusive and final, whether by the whole or a majority thereof of said commission.

Now, a word about engineers, of which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. LEWIS] has said so much. I may state without egotism that I have had something to do with that profession, having built a great competing line for western traffic and having had charge, from my own State, of the Hoosac tunnel for some two years, before it was contracted, and which cost Massachusetts ten millions—to reduce, like the present proposed improvement, the cost of transportation. Engineers are indispensable; figures, quantities must be had; but as a rule they (the engineers) are not economists. They should in this regard be controlled by the practical brains of self-made men. Even in the profession itself some of its strongest jewels, like Stephenson, and Loammi Baldwin of Massachusetts, educated themselves. I had occasion to test Baldwin's engineering, and his levels made twenty years before I had anything to do with public works. Sixty miles from Boston and tide-water, on the White Mountain ridge, we only varied a single foot from low tide. Now we ought to add the judgment of practical men to that of engineers, in a matter of so much importance to the country.

Sir, my friend from Missouri [Mr. STANARD] said yesterday that he hoped to see the time when the Mississippi Valley should produce four hundred million bales of cotton for export. I go further than that, for I do not wish to be here "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for countries thousands of miles away, furnishing simply raw material for them, to be paid back in the fabric made from the same material at 100 per cent. profit. Let that great valley keep their cotton; manufacturing it into yarns and cloth, for exportation, and for home consumption, and not export the raw cotton. The Mississippi Valley ought to do their own manufacturing at home, dike their own river as it should be done, and the happy millions that can be sustained on that rich delta cannot now be computed.

Sir, we have heard this very week much of Mormondom, but if we would take a few lessons on political economy from Brigham Young and his associates, who have made a wilderness of sage brush to blossom like the rose, who have made a wealthy community in twenty-five years, of barefooted men and women, by supplying the wants of their people at home—I say, sir, if we made our rivers and thoroughfares what they should be for cheap transportation, our manufacturing industries what they should be likewise, we should not now be crying after specie, of which we produce some hundred millions of dollars annually, or what is stranger still, crying from day to-day after bad money. Lord Bacon truly says:

There are three things that make a nation great and powerful: a fertile soil, busy workshops, an easy communication of men and merchandise from one place to another.

Mr. MCCRARY. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I believe my State will be found always ready for liberal appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River. For one I am not satisfied that the mouth of that river will ever be cleared out by eloquence. I am in the condition of many members of this House who are not satisfied with either plan which has been presented here, and who do not think it safe to expend so large a sum of money without such further surveys and examinations as will enable us to determine with more confidence which is the better plan. I hope, therefore, that the House will not support either the jetty or the canal plan without a further examination by a competent commission consisting of eminent civil and military engineers. I should be very glad to have Mr. Eads on the commission, or anybody else who has fame, reputation, and competent skill for that service. But it seems to me we ought to have a very careful and thorough examination, and not trust to any committee of the House or any single individual, however competent he may be.

Mr. MCCRARY. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

[Mr. DUNNELL then addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MCCRARY. I desire to call the attention of the House for a short time to the bill which the minority of the committee have reported as a substitute for what is known as the Eads bill. Before I do that, however, I wish to repeat a remark or two which I made yesterday when some gentlemen now here were perhaps not present.

Even if the House of Representatives should be disposed to adopt what is known as the jetty system, I am entirely confident that no man can justify his vote for the pending bill, for if there is any reliance to be placed upon careful estimates made by the Engineer Department, that bill proposes to give Mr. Eads, at the lowest calculation, $4,000,000 more than the work is worth, and perhaps $7,000,000 more than it is worth, according as the more expensive or the cheaper mode of construction shall be selected by him under the bill.

The estimates which General Humphreys reported to this House, and which are the basis of the statement which I now make, include, as he tells us, a fair profit for the contractor. Now if this plan is successful how can any man justify voting from four to seven million dollars more for the performance of the work than the Government can do it for itself on its own account? Is the Congress of the United States incompetent to decide, with all the light we have, after fifty years of experiments, with report after report on the feasibility of the canal system and the feasibility of the jetty system, is the Congress of the United States incompetent now to decide upon one or the other of these modes, and are we reduced to the extremity of saying we do not know what plan to adopt and we will therefore make a gambling contract, which, in case of success, will cost us twice or thrice what is fair?

Now let me call the attention of the House very briefly to the bill which I have proposed as a substitute for the report of the committee. The difficulty and the only difficulty in the way of adopting the canal system, and providing now for its immediate construction, is in the fact that the engineers did not have sufficient time to make all the borings and examinations necessary to a final and definite location and estimate of cost. The report of the Engineer Department is that they are unable for want of time to make a definite or exact estimate as to the cost of the canal. Therefore they suggest that it might be better to have a still further examination and survey before any appropriation is made. This difficulty we propose to obviate. If gentlemen will look at the bill which the minority of the committee have reported as a substitute for the report of the majority, they will discover that it provides that "the Secretary of War shall cause to be made in the most expeditious manner a thorough, detailed, and final survey and location of said canal. The survey and report of the engineers assigned to this duty shall exhibit complete plans and specifications of the work in the construction of such canal; and the estimates of the cost of each portion of the work shall accompany and form part of the report of such survey; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of such survey."

This much will be secured by this bill. The bill provides that after the survey is made, and the plans and specifications are adopted, the Secretary of War can contract for the entire work to be done in three years at an aggregate cost of not more than $8,000,000, then he shall go on and contract for the work. Otherwise, of course, the matter will go over for further legislation by another Congress, or at the next session of this Congress. I am myself confident that the whole work can be contracted for within the sum of $8,000,000.

It is true that the engineers in their report place the sum at a little over $10,000,000, but they are careful to say that they do that without having sufficient time to make the exact borings and examinations, and name that sum for the purpose of covering all contingencies; that it will cover the entire cost of the work in any event. Captain Howell's estimate was $7,400,000, and he has given more attention to it than any other man connected with the board.

The cost of the Suez Canal was $806,936 per mile. The length of the Fort Saint Philip Canal will be a little more than six miles. I have every assurance from competent authority that the cost of the Fort Saint Philip Canal will not be greater per mile than that of the Suez Canal. I have also an assurance that if the maximum is placed at $8,000,000, there will be lively competition among bidders for the contract below that sum. If I am wrong in this, if the minority of the committee are wrong, then the only effect of this bill will be to provide for the survey and location and a detailed estimate of the cost of the canal, and the matter will be left for further legislation hereafter; because the bill expressly provides that there shall be no contract let under it, unless it is for the whole work, for a sum not to exceed $8,000,000. This, then, is a safe proposition. It is one that can be supported by every gentleman who believes in improving the mouth of the Mississippi River by means of a canal. I believe the work will be built not only within this limit of cost, but for considerable less. The House takes no risk in adopting this bill. I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, the time that is left at my disposal is so extremely short that I can but call the attention of the House in all earnestness to two or three points that are presented in connection with this question. And first I ask members of the House whether they understand what the bill reported by the majority of the committee proposes? It calls for the expenditure of $11,000,000; $5,000,000 to be paid in one period and $6,000,000 during a later period but after the work is done. Those are the expense provisions of the bill in brief. How is it proposed to earn this $11,000,000? Where is it proposed to put the works? What are those works to be? Are they to be of stone, of wood, or of willow twigs? Are they to rest on solid bottom or on mud foundation? Being erected, how long will they last? Not an assurance is given by this bill upon any one of these points.

Again, sir, what do you propose by this bill to do with the lower part of the Mississippi River? You turn it over to Mr. Eads to do with it what he pleases. Every outlet, every pass, every embankment, every tree along that river is turned over by this bill, without any responsibility, to this engineer—this eminent engineer, if you please—whose name alone is mentioned in the bill. Can you sell out every one of the seventeen mouths of the Mississippi River without a bond, without a guarantee, without an opinion of your engineers, without a revisory control by a single officer representing the United States? Dare you turn over this great Father of Waters to one man? Dare you turn it over to the President himself, or to the War Department, or to the Navy Department? I for one answer that Congress dare not turn over to any single man this entire river to do with it as he pleases without the control of a single officer of the United States and for the sort of improvement proposed in this bill.

In this respect this is the most extravagant and most extraordinary bill that has ever been presented within my knowledge to Congress. You propose to give one man $11,000,000; and in the mean time you require nothing of him except a result that may not continue a single year after he has obtained the money. Secondly, Mr. Speaker, you propose that he shall have $5,000,000 when he has, in the language of the bill, "secured" twenty-eight feet of water by any system he chooses to adopt and by any outlet which he may select. The next section provides for the payment of $6,000,000 more if only he keeps, in any way whatever, that depth of water during the successive periods that are named while he is receiving the money. What is there proposed here except to make a bet with Mr. James B. Eads on the one side and the United States one the other, in which the stake is $6,000,000, that by some means or other he will be able to keep this twenty-eight feet of water until the last payment is made, nine years from the time that the work begins. I say, sir, that in these respects the bill is one of the most extraordinary I have ever known to be presented to Congress. It is provided at the end of the second section—I wish gentlemen would turn to the bill—

That the whole sum to be paid under this section shall not exceed the sum of $5,000,000, and for which the depth of water for vessels throughout the channel of such outlet or pass shall not be less, at ordinary flood-tide, than twenty-eight feet of water into the Gulf of Mexico.

Then the next section goes on to provide for paying him $6,000,000 more if from year to year he manages to keep that depth of water, the payments to be made at the rate of about $1,000,000 a year during a certain period, without any security that afterward you will not have to continue the work at your own cost, and at an expenditure of hundreds of thousands annually, in order to maintain the same depth of water he has obtained by annually extended jetties. In other words, your bill does not provide that his work shall permanently produce that depth, but only that he shall keep it up until the payments are made.

I have but a moment or two remaining to say a few words upon the general policy of this bill. I have for a year or two, with my non-professional knowledge of these subjects and such personal examination as a non-professional man may make at the mouth of the river, considered this question with that interest which you may suppose any western representative must have; and I affirm that there is not a river in the world the operations of which can be predicted with as little certainty as can those of the Mississippi River.

They talk about this enormous bank, which I beg gentlemen, if they have time, to look at on the map, (holding up a map)—that line there representing about ten miles—a flat, subaqueous mountain of mud. They propose to remove that mud out of the channel, and then by a supposed shore current, which I find from a paper laid on my desk just now that a Mr. McSweeney, who runs a fishing-smack, declares exists somewhere in the Gulf of Mexico—they propose, I say, to move that off so it shall not again form a bar.

Why, sir, this jettie system has been operated by nature for hundreds of years. Will you look at your maps and see how the natural jetty has been run out for hundreds of years, until a considerable part of the continent has been projected into the Gulf of Mexico by the movement of the bars and the deposit of alluvium? The mud has gone into the Gulf by this natural jetty system, always moving the great mass of the bars a certain distance every year. But now turn to the shore of the Black Sea, to the Soolina bar of the Danube where the shore current does exist, and see how straight the line is. It has smoothed as with a knife the shore of the Black Sea, while on the Gulf of Mexico the shore is like the teeth of a coarse comb, reaching out into the Gulf; and yet they say the shore current exists in the Gulf of Mexico as it does here at the Soolina mouth of the Danube upon the shore of the Black Sea. Up here, observe, on this map, comes in the Dniester, the Bug, and the Dnieper, at the northern part of the Black Sea, all moving their large volumes out into the sea, while right opposite, southward, the Bosphorus, with a current of four miles an hour, is perpetually draining an enormous volume from the Black Sea into the Sea of Marmora, and thence into the Ægean. No such conditions exist in the Gulf of Mexico, or affect the mouths of this gigantic stream.

Do not let us deal with shams on this great question at a cost of $11,000,000 of money. Why, sir, the laws of nature seem to indicate what our policy should be. What does your great river? It picks up in its rivulets the earth on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, it eats out as it advances the yellow earth of the plains, the western prairies of Iowa, and the fertile lands of Missouri; it casts into its great volume masses of the soil of the States of Illinois, Kentucky, and Arkansas, and so on southward, carrying a great mass perpetually, night and day, year after year, and for centuries, along its current into the Gulf of Mexico, until by the decree of Almighty God it is extending the State of Louisiana and the United States of America, away on toward the continent of South America where in the course of time it seems to be destined this land shall reach.

Now comes a gentleman who says that by the simple mode of applying an artificial jetty, instead of a natural one which nature has employed, he is going to contravene this law and prevent the decrees of the Almighty from being executed. It is utterly impossible, sir; and not only that, but this great river will not submit to your dictation or to that of any board of engineers. It has often shown its power against the will of man, and but recently our hearts quailed at the manifestation of its despotic character. Its little threads work their way into the levees raised by human skill; they work a little rivulet through them, and suddenly the great Father of Waters has burst his bounds and almost submerged a State of this Union. Sir, its action you cannot control. It is three thousand feet wide at its outlet, and it is proposed by this bill to reduce that outlet to six hundred feet in width. Is the river going to submit to that without rising in the rear, bursting its banks as it has done time and time again? It will break your artificial bounds. It will have its way, and its choice of ways. There is but one thing for us to do who desire to secure prosperity to the southern part of this great Mississippi Valley and to promote that of the northern part, and that is to flank the natural exits of the river. Leave it to its own laws. Let it build out its banks, let it do what it will with its great bars, and it is then indifferent to us if we have an artificial channel at a less cost. This work will stand as long as the art of man, aided by still water, may provide. This outlet is practicable, is recommended by an able board of impartial engineers, will meet the wants of commerce, will cheapen freights from eighteen States and Territories, and will avoid a contest with the terrific forces of an unmanageable and mighty river.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, I have been singularly pressed by members who wish to speak on this question, and I ask the indulgence of the House to give half an hour more to be distributed among those who wish to speak on this occasion. We of the committee have been liberal ourselves,

Mr. RUSK. This is private-bill day.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not object if the time be fairly distributed, but I think it would be quite unusual to allow my colleague an hour and a half in which to close debate. That would be a remarkable proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has an hour in which to close debate.

Mr. HURLBUT. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] yields to me for a moment to say that I had intended to submit some remarks to the House in opposition to what I regard as this wild jetty experiment; but I was too ill to attend the session of the House yesterday and I am too weak to-day to speak. I therefore must content myself with expressing my position on this question by my votes alone.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3009) for the relief of Michael Bannon, of Dayton, Ohio;

An act (H. R. No. 3007) granting a pension to Cordelia Wilkins;

An act (H. R. No. 3011) granting a pension to Mrs. Letitia Carr;

An act (H. R. No. 3014) to place the name of Mrs. Caroline Duncan on the pension-roll;

An act (H. R. No. 3012) granting a pension to John Heddinger;

An act (H. R. No. 3019) granting a pension to George H. Reynolds;

An act (H. R. No. 3160) in reference to the shipping commissioners act, approved June 7, 1872;

An act (H. R. No. 3574) explanatory of the act of June 30, 1864; and

An act (H. R. No. 2545) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel sure on this occasion that I shall be able to rise to the magnitude of the great interests that are here involved, but I think I can feel sure of one thing, that I shall not descend to the littleness of indiscriminate censure and personal attack upon men who may happen to differ from me. The arguments which have been presented here in opposition to this measure and in sustentation of this canal scheme may be divided into two classes—one represented by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] reasonable, fair, candid, and broad in its statements—the other class to a large extent colored by what I am compelled to characterize as prejudice, and tending to lead this House to the consideration of other questions than those which are in fact involved in this issue.

All who have spoken on this question recognize the necessity of some speedy national action. All recognize that there is no other civilized country on the globe which, having such a river given to it by the goodness of God, would allow it in all its beneficial effects to be paralyzed during all this long period of years. It is a national disgrace, a national ignominy. Other gentlemen have presented on this occasion the statistics of that large and wide country which is more or less dependent upon the free navigation and the free use of the Mississippi River. I shall not follow them now, sir. I assume that this House knows that this question is the most national of any that has yet been brought up.

Some gentlemen have spoken here with some appearance of learning upon the subject who do not understand the first principle about the Mississippi River, who know nothing at all about the characteristics of the stream. Starting, sir, as it does from the far Northwest, it curves down by Minnesota and Iowa and Northern Illinois a pure stream, as bright as the brightest that sparkles in the granite hills of New England. But, sir, when its mighty tributary—if it be not the main stream—the Missouri, comes in loaded with the erosions which it has made in all those vast plains which it traverses, the character of the great river changes, and all its affluents from that point down come loaded with material gathered from twenty-seven States and Territories, mingling up the current into one turbid mass, and so loaded the Mississippi seeks to reach the open sea, the deep Gulf. In its downward course, sir, it shoots from point to point, making these great bends in the river until it reaches what we may consider its normal depth and normal width as it comes into the delta below Baton Rouge, and from above the city of New Orleans down to the heads of the passes the river runs with a quiet, steady, and rapid current. The banks do not give way, soft as the material is of which they are constructed, because the volume of the river in its depth and in its width has settled and the channel is able to perform the duty for which the river has excavated it. Its unfinished work is after it divides its volume at the head of the pass and seeks by various outlets to reach the Gulf. The power which the main column of the current had is divided up. It has sought to pass out to the east and the southeast and the south, and now the great volume of its waters is turning through this same Southwest Pass.

Now, every gentleman knows by the most familiar example that if you take a tumblerful of turbid, muddy water and let it stand, it settles and the sediment goes to the bottom. You stir it up and agitate it and give it motion. The motion gives it power to hold these particles of earth in mechanical suspension and carry it on. And the trouble about the Mississippi mouth is that the river by its division into these branches and by the shallowness of its volume has lost in some degree the power of carrying this suspended material out into the deep waters of the Gulf. That is sought to be remedied by the bill which I, representing the majority of your committee, have presented to the House. It is sought to be remedied by merely accelerating the very work which the river is doing now.

All of us who have ever seen water run know the rapidity of the current is in the middle of the stream; and as the volume and rapidity of the current are there and it carries more matter, the current along the shores is less, and the power of carrying matter is less, and therefore the shores of one of these turbid rivers are constantly being built up by deposits from this slower water, while the main volume in the center deposits little, if any. The proposition of Mr. Eads is no secret. It is no invention. There is no patent-right upon it. The thing has been done and in use from time immemorial.

To antagonize this project there is brought in, originally by the Representatives from Louisiana, or rather from the city of New Orleans, the plan of a canal extending from a point below Fort Saint Philip out into a shallow lagoon of the Gulf of Mexico, that is known as the Isle au Breton Pass. And the gentlemen who talked yesterday in regard to that pass do not happen to know the topography of it as well as the men who have been there and seen it. This Isle au Breton Pass or Bay is simply a lagoon of the Gulf of Mexico; and the sea there has thrown up, as it has done all along our coast by the effect of its own waves, certain detached sand islands. For it is one of the strange facts in physics that the very forces which seek to destroy are the very forces which renovate. The great bulk of the Atlantic Ocean, surging constantly upon the shores of these United States below Barnegat, is checked by its own action by heaping up in front of the mainland a long chain of islands which protects it from the dashing, incoming, mighty roll of the great ocean.

Now, sir, in the first place the topography of this canal is not settled. I beg gentlemen's attention here. I shall not stop to read from the reports in the short time I have unless gentlemen ask me to do so. I say we have in print from our own Chief of Engineers, in response to an inquiry from our committee, the distinct statement that the scientific surveys of that canal are not so far advanced that he as Chief of Engineers dare to recommend any appropriation for it. Now, gentlemen, you who stand upon the reports of the engineers, what do you say to that? I know that ground. You get back from the comparatively hard bank which the river piles up. Many gentlemen may not know that in all instances the banks of the Mississippi are higher than the ground behind it. The drainage runs from these banks back into the swamps or lagoons beyond. Fort Saint Philip is built upon one of those banks. Beyond it, over this line which this canal seeks, is a marsh or trembling morass that nothing which is not web-footed can stand upon.

Mr. SYPHER. Fort Saint Philip is built on it.

Mr. HURLBUT. This makes the risk and the hinderance and the difficulty in the construction of this very canal. Why, sir, you will have to anchor it when you get it. Besides its being an utterly incompetent and insufficient method of bringing about the result which is sought, it is harassed by engineering difficulties that are infinitely higher than any that were ever presented in such a problem of engineering. With firm ground to work on that would stay, you can build a canal anywhere if you have money enough and water enough.

Mr. SYPHER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly.

Mr. SYPHER. Is it not a fact that both Fort Jackson and Fort Saint Philip are constructed upon this trembling territory of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir.

Mr. SYPHER. Upon a clay foundation, as the engineers report, of twenty-five feet in thickness?

Mr. HURLBUT. I have stated that Fort Jackson and Fort Saint Philip stand upon the natural levee which the Mississippi has built for itself. And I state further to the gentleman from Louisiana that he must know that whenever there comes one of those cyclones which they talk of, one of those tidal waves which they talk of, seven to eleven feet deep, it drives across the marsh from the sea, and more than once all the ditches of Fort Saint Philip have been filled by débris brought from the Gulf of Mexico in one of these cyclones.

Mr. SYPHER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. HURLBUT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SYPHER. Has that water injured the ditches of Fort Saint Philip; and will the gentleman tell me how water can injure a canal?

Mr. HURLBUT. I heard the gentleman make that same unwise remark yesterday. If he has ever had anything to do with a canal, he should know that the one thing which has ever hurt it is water. Fire does not break a canal; water does. Water is an element of danger in a canal as well as of use. Let those gentlemen who live on the Erie Canal say what the breaches there in the spring of the year mean. The ditches of that fort have been filled more than three times with débris carried by waves across that very morass where they now propose to build this canal, averaging from seven to eleven feet. And what filled those ditches can fill your canal, not with water, but with silt and sand, and you will have to excavate again.

I know, sir, that we have a thriving and industrious people round about there; but I know, as the record before me shows, that it so happened that the moment the Engineer Corps, on the 9th of January—if my memory serves me correctly—determined that they would report favorably upon this canal scheme in six days thereafter, which is just about the time the mail would take to go from New Orleans to New York, all this land through which the canal was to pass was entered by certain private individuals, who entered up every foot of a territory of nine thousand acres through which this canal thus intended to be built would pass. It was entered by and is now held by a close corporation of gentlemen in New Orleans, some of whom bear very close relations to eminent gentlemen in the military service.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, here made a remark which was inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. HURLBUT. All the lands, or rather the lands mixed with water, because the land there is about the consisteney of thick mud, are now in the hands of a body of men in New Orleans, who have entered it as a speculation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; I cannot yield.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman only one question, and it is whether these gentlemen had not a right under the law to acquire this land?

Mr. HURLBUT. The land is worth nothing. It was sold to these gentlemen on affidavit which they made that it was subject to overflow, and was sold to them at the rate of twenty-five cents an acre.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Cannot the Government condemn that land if it needs it?

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not see any provision in this bill for condemnation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That is provided for by general law.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not know of any general law on the subject.

Mr. CONGER. We passed a bill here the other day providing for that.

Mr. HURLBUT. I cannot yield further. Now, Mr. Speaker, this land is in the hands of a local monetary interest. I do not, of course, say that that affects the action of the gentlemen who represent the city of New Orleans. They have a larger interest; they want the expenditure of an untold amount of money; they want to commit the Government to a project which your own engineers tell you from surveys will cost not less than $10,300,000, and when the Government is once committed to it it must be carried out, and all that money must be expended in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much of this money, if the other proposition be adopted, would be expended there; but I do state that there is this objection to the plan existing within our own knowledge as detailed here by scientific men, establishing the fact in the first place that the Government is not prepared by the showing of any survey to go into any such operation as this canal at this time.

Now, sir, I do not antagonize the canal. When it turns out that it is the best thing we can get, I will vote any amount of money that may be necessary to make the mouth of the Mississippi free by whatever mode may be deemed the best; but I insist that we should not be cut off from trying what the very best engineers of the country, including the Chief of the Engineer Corps himself, long ago recommended as the best provision for this purpose.

And this, Mr. Speaker, leads me to say a few words about this question of the Engineer Corps. I would judge them with absolute fairness and would censure nothing excepting where I think censure is deserved. But intemperate speeches have been made here in which the committee were charged unkindly with quackery in setting up their own opinions against that of the Engineer Corps, and this I regard as simply official insolence. The brain of the country, the willing power of the country is in Congress. These people are our servants; they act as we direct and we take their opinions and accept them for what they are worth; but I have yet to learn that the Congress of these United States cannot undertake a great improvement without permission from General Humphreys or any other engineer officer in the service.

Before I pass to other topics, I must notice the very cruel and undeserved remark made by the other gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SHELDON,] in regard to General Barnard. I regretted it when it fell from his lips, and I regret it the more when I see it deliberately published in the RECORD of to-day. What right had the gentleman or any one else to say of that great soldier and great military engineer that he is the oldest and feeblest of the Engineer Corps? It is putting himself directly athwart of the unbiased judgment of the whole country. Sir, there is no man in the service of the United States to-day whose record stands so unimpeachably high as does the record of General Barnard. He is no old man, sir. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says he knew him as a boy, and who would venture to call the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means an old man? Sir, it is wrong. General Barnard is not off active duty. He is on the most responsible duty that belongs to that Engineer Corps to-day, and but for the unfortunate defect in hearing, General Barnard would have held the place which General Humphreys holds to-day, and according to the doctrine of gentlemen we would have been tied down to the opinions of General Barnard instead of being tied down to the opinions of General Humphreys.

Now, sir, we had no engineers in this country forty years ago; we were glad to take officers from West Point where they got some education looking that way. But their business is military engineering; that is what they are educated for. It is true the country has devolved upon them the charge of a great many surveys with regard to our lakes and harbors, and they perform their duty. I am not finding fault with them. But in 1873 the Engineer Bureau, through their chief, wrote a letter, which I have here, in which they stated that they had not men enough to do their work; that there were one hundred and fifty-five officers in their department, and at that time they were employing one hundred and sixty odd civilians. What I say now about the Engineer Corps is simply this: that science does not stand military discipline. It is irreverent and improper and insubordinate for any member of the Engineer Corps to differ with his superior upon a scientific fact. Now science has no close corporations, it will not stand it. The country has been developed by the high premiums that have been offered for the great successes of civil engineering. Schools of technology devoted to this branch of science are all over the country. The educated intellect of the country in this civil engineering business is to-day far ahead of the tardy progress which our own military board of engineers have made. I say it with regret, but I know how it comes to pass.

It is but a few years since a gentleman now holding the position of president of one of these schools of ours for science and art was a civil employé of the Engineer Bureau. That gentleman was in charge of the surveys of the mouth of a river. By patient study and diligent investigation he discovered certain facts which he supposed showed the existence of laws heretofore unknown. He wanted to publish those views, but he was informed that as his views on that subject differed from what the Chief of Engineers had laid down in his great book on the hydraulics and physics of the Mississippi River, he must not do it. But in the interest of science he went on and did it, and they dropped him, and he is now the president of one of our colleges, and the scientific world has taken up and adopted his views.

Look at the influence of this system of military subordination upon the rising intellect of the country. In the building of the great bridge across the Mississippi River, with which the name of this Mr. Eads is so honorably connected, we have an example in point. Engineers doubted. They proved mathematically that the bridge could not be built, that the five hundred and twenty-five feet of arch could not sustain its own weight. Yet people believed in Eads; he believed in himself; and he went in and built the bridge, and it stands there now.

There are a couple of steamers on the Mississippi which have a fancy for extravagantly high chimneys, utterly useless, but supposed to be ornamental. They complained that at certain stages of the water it was a little unsafe for their chimneys, not for the boats, to go under the bridge; and a board of Army engineers was solemnly detailed down there to investigate that question. And how, in the name of common sense, do you suppose they settled it. Instead of saying to these steamboats "There are but two of you any how, and all you have to do is to drop your chimneys ten feet," they solemnly resolved to leave the river and dig a canal on the Illinois side around the approaches to the bridge, with a draw in it, so as to allow these two steamers with tall chimneys to go through! But men of science and men who had no science, but had some sense, met that proposition with such a roar of derision, that it just dropped dead, and lies there to-day among the papers of the Engineer Department never to be resurrected.

I object to this plan for a canal as proposed in this substitute, because it undertakes to vote an absolutely inadequate sum of money to perform the work, and because it is not guarded, as in my judgment it should be guarded. It has no provision by which the United States can condemn the right of way across there at once. And it entails upon us a hopeless expenditure of money. I hope gentlemen have read the letter of General Barnard upon the incomplete condition of the surveys of the canal. In regard to the lockage alone into the canal, the highest rapidity which they estimate a ship can pass through that lock is forty minutes. Now suppose that the next one is ready to go through. Practically it would take an hour, and from that to an hour and a half, for a ship to go through that lock. What sort of a remedy is that for the commerce of a city which those gentlemen and I too hope to see rivaling that of any of our sea-ports in the future. What sort of a remedy is that?

Again, there is no provision in the proposed bill for those expenses which are necessarily incidental to the work. See the report of Captain Howell and the report of the board of engineers. They tell you that they do not know now enough to even determine the line upon which the canal should be built. This canal, too, must have jetties. When you come to the shore of the bay you must carry out jetties far enough to reach deep water. The distance which they will have to go will depend upon the line which they adopt for the canal. The canal and the channel between the jetties will have to be perpetually dredged. There is no harbor there, and there never was, and there never will be till you make it. Now off the Southwest Pass there is anchorage ground, where ships for the last hundred years have ridden safely in this same tenacious mud that comes down the Mississippi River and is deposited there. To make your canal a success you must build these jetties out into thirty-five feet of water in Breton Bay. And you must in some way or other, by breakwaters or otherwise, provide a harbor of entrance and refuge. And if this canal is the only means by which the city of New Orleans can be reached, by which the whole commerce of the Mississippi Valley can be transported, then you must defend it. You must expend millions upon millions in establishing competent fortifications to cover this canal, or your commerce will at all times be at the mercy of the enemy. Your old forts there, Fort Saint Philip and Fort Jackson, do not cover it or reach it. The mouth of your canal, out there in the open sea, has to be defended. The gentleman alluded to the Suez Canal. Does he know what the simple breakwater to inclose the harbor of the Suez Canal has cost? It has cost over $6,000,000, in a sandy beach just as this is; for the whole bottom of Breton Pass is sea-sand.

I am warned by the clock that I must come to the other branch of the subject, after first disposing of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] who last spoke, and who I believe did not read or did not understand this bill. He asked this House, with that emphasis which he can always assume, whether it proposes to throw all the outlets of this great river into the hands of this man, Eads. Now, sir, the first section of the bill has this proviso, which controls the whole:

Provided, That no such works or means employed by him shall hinder, delay, or materially interfere with the free navigation of any channel now navigated by large vessels.

Is not that an answer to the gentleman's ad captandum appeal—a style of appeal, I regret to say, in which the gentleman generally indulges? There is not a word of truth in the supposition on which his argument is built.

But my friend, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. MCCRARY,] rests his opposition to this jetty plan upon two propositions, and challenges contradiction in the assumptions which he has made. He states in the first place that a vast volume of rolling matter is carried along by the whirling sub-current of the Mississippi; infinitely vaster in volume than that which is held in mechanical suspension. Sir, it so happens that the facts do not support the gentleman's statement. It so happens that where the river has current enough and rush enough it does, as you see all other streams do, sweep first mud, then sand, then gravel, then boulders in proportion to the power of its current.

But, sir, it so happened that some years ago this General Humphreys, then Captain Humphreys, with the assistance of Captain Abbot, of the Engineer Corps, made a detailed and exhaustive study of the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi River; and the old remark in Job, "O, that mine adversary had written a book!" comes back with wonderful vigor and effect upon this occasion. On page 449 of this book, which was published at the expense of the Government, was gotten up by our engineers, and therefore must be authority, I find some remarks in regard to the question of current which I will take up first. Now, everybody knows—because, as I understand, engineering is only common sense applied to scientific propositions—everybody knows that the mass of matter that is carried out by the river is carried farther and farther out to sea in proportion to its volume. Everybody knows that as it runs into the dead water it sooner or later will drop by losing its force, and make this extension of the bar which gentlemen speak of. If there are currents there which have force enough to distribute this matter, it will be carried east or west as the current may happen to run, and will go out into the general sweep of the sea.

Now, I want to state one common-sense proposition which I believe every member of this House who has ever seen water run will understand. Out there in the Gulf of Mexico from fifteen to twenty miles from the shore runs this sweeping current of the Gulf Stream driven in between the Pass of Yucatan and Cuba, which sweeps clear around the whole coast of the Gulf of Mexico and passes along by the cape to Florida, losing itself far off yonder in the northeast on the shores of Spitzbergen, Norway, and Ireland.

That current runs there; and it runs permanently; it runs always; it runs with a steady force. Now, necessarily there is a counter-current running the other way; and it is just as inevitable that there must be an inshore current between the Gulf Stream and the shore running westward as that the Gulf Stream itself runs eastward.

What is the proof of this? For the gentlemen challenge proof. The proof in the first place is in certain facts which the Engineer Corps know perfectly well—which everybody that knows anything about that country knows very well. All that shore of Louisiana west of the Southwest Pass is being constantly rubbed down, abraded and carried off by this very southwesterly current. The Isle Derniere that used to be a bathing-place down there some thirty years ago has been cut off and reduced to one-fifth its former dimensions. We had a fort down there, Fort Livingston, which we have been compelled to protect by jetties and piers to prevent the territory on which it stands from being swept away by this current. More than this, the Chief of Engineers says in this book on page 449—I cannot stop to read the whole of it—

> Winds may change the direction and force of these currents, which, in mid-river current, at a depth of 40 feet, are shown by the observations to vary from .3 of a foot to 2.5 feet per second, the mean being about .5 of a foot. As a velocity of .5 of a foot per second is sufficient to transport the material of which the bar is formed, the action of Gulf currents in carrying into deeper water the material pushed by the river into the Gulf, is evident.

Can I give you any stronger testimony than the testimony of the Chief of Engineers here in his elaborate report? That the action of the gulf carries into deeper water the material pushed by the river into the Gulf is evident.

Here in an appendix to this same work are some measurements, a long table of them, extending through a series of months from May to November, establishing an average velocity of about one foot per second of this current which sweeps across the mouth of the Southwest Pass, and the Chief of Engineers tells you five-tenths of a foot per second is sufficient.

I was not satisfied with that which was known from official reports. At the time I was down in that country and had something to do with it. I made the acquaintance of a gentleman by the name of Bailey. I apprehend no gentleman from Louisiana will undertake to question either the integrity or the ability or the skill and experience in his profession as an engineer of Mr. Bailey. While I commanded the Department of the Gulf he was our engineer in charge of those great works we had of necessity to keep up, because the country could not keep them up. I wrote to him I wanted facts on this question, and he consulted men who would know. I am told his letter is published and upon your tables; I will state the contents of it. Substantially it was this: He went to men who worked in these waters, to fishermen, to captains of fishing-smacks and of vessels, and to the captains of the Morgan line of steamers which were constantly crossing on that line, and all unite in saying there is such a westerly current moving around there. It is increased by the prevalence of easterly winds; but the current is known at all times. And, gentlemen, I would rather have the opinion of a fisherman that has to tug with his oars against a two and a half mile current than all the professors, actual and sham, New Orleans has sent here on this subject. Those are the facts.

Now, then, the proposition, as I understand it, is this: We do not assume to be engineers but as having done the plain duty with which we were charged by this House. This question comes before the House from a committee which you authorized to look into this matter. We have done so. We have presented to you the results of our investigation without reference to the opinion of one man or another. We think we, as a committee, and the House have the right to determine for ourselves what shall be done with the money of the United States for national objects.

But, sir, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] made another point, and that point was that great masses of solid matter were pushed along the bottom of the Mississippi River. It is the queerest thing in the world, I suppose, (and he gets his idea from our engineers;) but here now and then these gentlemen contradict themselves tremendously. Here I have a statement of the Chief of Engineers in Executive Document No. 220, in which he states no matter is carried past the city of New Orleans which differs at all from that which is held in suspension; that neither sand nor gravel nor lumps of clay nor anything else but this matter, which is held in mechanical suspension by the river, passed beyond New Orleans. I do not understand what gentlemen mean by taking back at one time what they have scientifically asserted at another.

Now, sir, the proposition is simply to give to the Mississippi River an early opportunity of breaking its way through the very last obstruction that stands between it and deep water. I wish to state one clear, distinct proposition both of common sense and of mathematics in reference to which none that I know of differ. Mr. Eads's proposition is to run these banks forward over the crest of the bar into water which will give him from thirty to thirty-five feet, and to let the course of the river sweep it out. Suppose the calculation of General Humphreys is correct, and that this enormous mass of mud and sand is carried by mechanical action of the river and will reproduce the bar. Suppose the jetties were in thirty feet of water at the point where the bar now stands, then the bar can only be reproduced at the same distance seaward it now bears to the end of the present natural jetty. I have a calculation made in the Coast Survey Office, by which it is shown, taking all these data given by the Chief of Engineers, that to reproduce that bar with a depth of thirty feet of water five miles from the point where Mr. Eads's jetties cease will take until the year 2100, allowing every one of these extravagant data upon which the engineers now stand. Well, if we can get deep water there until the year 2100, we shall have done our duty at all events by the present century and the next.

There is one other thing I wish to speak of. It is said that this matter is not presented to us by any skilled engineer. It is presented to us by a man who has won a reputation for himself by the scientific labors of a life-time. On the success of this work he perils his own capital and the capital of his friends, and his own high and distinguished reputation. He is backed up in this by the best civil engineers in this country and in Europe. Sir Charles Hartley, to whom allusion has been made, in a letter which I have seen indorses this proposition to the fullest extent, and only cautions Mr. Eads to beware of one danger, giving the case of the river Rhone as an illustration. In building the jetties on the river Rhone they did not push them far enough over the crest of the bar. The result was that the bar shot ahead of them, and Sir Charles Hartley cautions Mr. Eads to press the construction of his jetties to the farthest possible extent; to cross the present bar so as to cut off its progress; and says that after that the increased volume and rush of the great river and the distributing currents of the Gulf will take care of this bar.

Some gentlemen have talked here with regard to the matter of the construction of these jetties. There is no secret about that, sir. Men have talked here as if it were expected that Mr. Eads would build a lot of stone piers on the yielding banks of the Mississippi River. Not so. That is not his way. He works with nature, not against it. He proposes to build these jetties just as foundations have been obtained for the dikes in Holland over those vast morasses which have been reclaimed there; putting together long bundles of fascines of willow or other material and making of them a float wide enough and long enough to be floated down and brought into place, filling gradually crosswise and lengthwise and settling it down into the mud, and then—and here is the beauty of the proposition—making the Mississippi do its own packing; the turbid water of the Mississippi as it whirls along amid these interstices and openings depositing everywhere the earth with which it is loaded. We get simply a skeleton foundation for these jetties and leave the river to do what it inevitably will, take the work and complete it. In this way the jetties will accommodate themselves to the undulations of the bottom. They will rise but a trifle above the ordinary level of the water, and will stand where far more pretentious undertakings would fall to pieces.

These mud-lumps which have been talked of never did rise and never can rise in deep water. Here again if I had time I would quote from this very valuable book on the Physics and Hydraulics of the Mississippi River. The mud-lump must necessarily by its constitution rise in shallow water. Why? Because to make the mud-lumps there must be a sufficient amount of this tough deposit to hold the gases which come up from below, expanding into a sort of dome. And if you have not got that material you cannot have the mud-lumps. You cannot have that material where the river has a free current. It is only deposited where the current is broken and resisted. Again, after the bed of the river is packed and settled it will make these levees year by year stronger and stronger; because all along the river, wherever there is a piece of earth as large as my hand, the floating seeds of cottonwood, &c., attach themselves to it, take root, and a forest grows up, the trees holding material together by their roots. Thus nature and the river co-operate in strengthening the work.

There are many other things which I would like to speak of, but I am warned that my time is drawing to a conclusion. I simply reiterate that the canal itself is not a work for which the military engineers of the Government have ventured to ask an appropriation, and that every one of them unites in the statement that the plans of the canal are wholly incomplete, and that it will require from a year to a year and a half to secure perfect plans and estimates and specifications for the work. On the other hand Mr. Eads, by this bill, is bound to begin in eight months from the time the bill is approved and becomes a law; and he is bound to go on.

And I desire to say here in reply to a mistaken statement made by my friend from Iowa that it is not true that Mr. Eads can take the South Pass at all. The gentleman is mistaken. The South Pass is to-day narrower than the least possible limit allowed by this bill. It is less than five hundred feet wide. And I shall accept the amendment which has been suggested by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. LEWIS,] giving a larger latitude in favor of the United States, requiring Mr. Eads to make an extension of not less than twelve hundred feet of surface in the channel proposed.

There is one other thing to which I desire to refer. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] has entirely mistaken what was reported by the Chief of Engineers as to the cost of this construction. I read from Executive Document No. 220, from a letter written by this same General Humphreys. He says:

I have prepared an estimate of the cost of applying jetties to the Southwest Pass bar to obtain twenty-seven feet at mean low water, or twenty-eight feet at mean high water, the structures to extend down to the full depth of twenty-eight feet at high water. The cost is $7,000,000.

That was his estimate of the cost of the jetties. But hear him again upon the question of cost:

The annual cost of maintaining the depth by extending the jetties, according to my estimate, will be about $1,000,000, which, considered as interest at 6 per cent. per annum, represents a capital of $16,000,000. This, added to the first cost of my estimate, gives $23,000,000 for the expense to the Government of securing a permanent depth of twenty-seven feet at mean low water.

To secure the same depth by constructing and maintaining a canal will cost $13,000,000.

Now, sir, to erect and maintain this work and secure to the United States an uninterrupted outflow of this great river, Captain Eads proposes to do the whole work of building and maintaining these jetties for nine years at a cost of $11,000,000; and if he can do it and shall do it, no man living will have conferred upon the great Mississippi Valley and upon the entire nation so great a benefit in this century.

You will find always in reading these documents from the Engineer Corps that whenever they are against a man's plan they think it will be eminently expensive, but when they see that it is going to succeed, then they find that it will cost a great deal less than they originally estimated. I think I have shown that their opinions upon these questions are entitled to no weight.

Mr. Speaker, I have no special interest in this matter. Although the country in which I live furnishes some of the water which runs down into this great channel, yet we have in my own immediate district no means of communication by water, nor are we soon likely to have, with that great commerce which we hope will flow shortly to and fro through the mouth of the Mississippi River. I have only the interest in it which belongs to every citizen of the country; I will not say every western man, for on such a question as this I insist that every man ought to rise above all mere questions of locality and stand in favor of a great national work at the nation's expense without considering whether it is going to benefit particularly the section in which he lives. The majority of the committee, and it was quite a large majority, have given all the attention to this subject that our opportunities would allow, and I do not know of anything that I regret so much as that my colleague on that committee from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is now absent on duty to which he has been assigned by the House, so that we could have the benefit of his clear intellect and laborious studies in favor of this plan. I regret deeply that he is not here.

Now the choice is before the House between these two modes of carrying out this improvement. I do not suppose that anybody seriously proposes to postpone these bills. We have got to do something in reference to this question, and if I shall have succeeded in impressing upon this House the advantage of this particular system over the one which is its competitor, then when five years shall have rolled by, and when steamers that can enter any port in this Union can by their own power move uninterruptedly up to the levees and wharves of New Orleans, I shall feel prouder of having contributed to such a result than of anything else that I may have done in public life. You may try the canal scheme; you may build a canal, but so intolerable will be the delays and nuisances of that kind of communication, that sooner or later you will have to come back to and meet again this very problem. After expending $25,000,000 upon the canal there, you will have to adopt just such a plan substantially as this, and have the work done either by private contract or by the Government itself, because we who live in that great valley will desire to have this experiment tried if the canal fails; and after it is built the demand will come up reiterated with increasing strength from that section of the country for an open, uninterrupted river mouth, accessible to vessels of every draught.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has just expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. In view of the misunderstanding between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] and myself as to the amendment which I offered yesterday, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I now send to the desk may be considered as pending, and I ask that it be heard. I propose to offer it as a substitute for the two bills reported by the committee.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no objection to its being read.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. GARFIELD, as follows:

That the President shall appoint a commission of three eminent engineers, one from the Army, one from the Navy, and one from civil life; and said commission shall make a thorough examination and survey of the mouths of the Mississippi River with a view to determining the most practicable and economical plan for the permanent improvement of the navigation of said river in its connection with the provided for in accordance with instructions to be given them by the President, and Gulf of Mexico, to such an extent as may be required by the military, naval, and commercial wants of the United States; said commission to prosecute the work herein shall report to the President at as early a day as practicable a plan or plans to effect the objects herein set forth, whether by jetties, canals, or otherwise, with detailed estimates of the cost of the same and the time required for completion; and the President shall communicate the said report to Congress at its next session with his recommendation thereon.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of said commission; all disbursements for this purpose, to be made on the order and at the discretion of the President.

SEC. 3. That in order to maintain for the present the security of navigation of the mouths of the Mississippi, the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment may be considered as pending.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move to reconsider the vote whereby the main question was ordered.

Mr. STONE. If the previous question is reconsidered will other amendments be in order?

The SPEAKER. That will be for the House to determine.

The question was taken upon the motion to reconsider; and upon a division there were—ayes 84, noes 69.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. STANARD called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HURLBUT and Mr. GARFIELD were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. Is debate in order on the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because it is to reconsider an undebatable motion. If the main question is reconsidered, then the bill will be divested of the previous question.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 85, noes 83.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. STANARD called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 101, nays 119, not voting 69; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. KELLOGG said: I am paired with Mr. HALE, of Maine.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SHELDON.]

Mr. SHELDON. I withdraw that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is upon the substitute moved by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] for the substitute reported from the committee. The committee's substitute will be treated as an original bill.

Mr. McCRARY. In view of the importance of these propositions, I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read the substitute reported from the committee, as follows:

That James B. Eads be, and he is hereby, authorized, with such others as may be associated with him, to proceed in the work of deepening the channel of one of the outlets or passes of the Mississippi River into the Gulf of Mexico, to be selected by himself, by permanent or sufficient jetties at or near its mouth, and for that purpose may construct, in the river, outlet, or pass, and likewise in the Gulf of Mexico, such walls, jetties, dikes, levees, and other structures, and employ such boats, rafts, and appliances, as may, in the prosecution of said works, be deemed necessary: Provided, That no such works or means employed by him shall hinder, delay, or materially interfere with the free navigation of any channel now navigated by large vessels: Provided further, That unless the construction of the proposed works shall be substantially commenced by said Eads and his associates within eight months from the date of the approval of this act, and prosecuted with due diligence and without unnecessary delay, the provisions contained herein shall be null and void. And unless the said Eads and his associates shall secure twenty feet of water, as hereinafter provided, within thirty months of the date of the approval of this act, Congress may revoke the privileges herein granted, and cancel the obligations herein assumed by the United States. And Congress may revoke the privileges herein granted, and cancel the obligations herein assumed by the United States unless said Eads and his associates shall, after securing twenty feet of water, secure an additional depth of two feet during each succeeding year thereafter until twenty-six feet shall have been secured, and two feet additional, or twenty-eight feet, within twenty-four months after having secured twenty-six feet. And in case said Eads and his associates shall fail to comply with the foregoing conditions as to depth of water and time for any period of twelve months in excess of the time fixed in each case, then this act shall absolutely become null and void without action by Congress. And to protect his said works, he may build and maintain such levees or embankments as may be necessary to secure their permanency along the banks of the river or passes.

SEC. 2. That whenever said Eads and his associates shall have succeeded in establishing and maintaining twenty-two feet depth of water throughout the channel of one of the outlets or passes of said Mississippi River into the Gulf of Mexico at ordinary flood-tide by means of the works described in the preceding section, and such outlet or pass shall have a clear width on its surface of not less than six hundred feet between the works or jetties in such outlet or pass, so that ships drawing twenty-two feet of water may be navigated safely and expeditiously throughout said channel, and such depth shall be wide enough to allow two such ships to be passed by each other in safety, then the Government of the United States shall pay said Eads or his legal representatives $2,000,000 at the time hereinafter stated; and for every additional depth of two feet of water in the channel of said outlet or pass in like manner established and maintained by the said works he shall receive from the Government of the United States, at the time hereinafter stated, an additional sum of $1,000,000: Provided, That the whole sum to be paid under this section shall not exceed the sum of $5,000,000, and for which the depth of water for vessels throughout the channel of such outlet or pass shall not be less at ordinary flood-tide than twenty-eight feet into the Gulf of Mexico.

SEC. 3. That whenever it shall appear by the report of the commissioners hereinafter provided for that said Eads and his associates have established and maintained a navigable channel-way for the passage of vessels from the Gulf of Mexico into the Mississippi River of not less than twenty-eight feet of water in depth at ordinary flood-tide, and through an outlet or pass to the Gulf of Mexico of not less than six hundred feet in width, within which said ship-channel is designed to be permanently maintained, said Eads, or his legal representatives, shall be entitled to receive from the Government of the United States, in addition to the sums hereinbefore stated, an additional sum of $6,000.000, to be paid in manner and under the conditions hereinafter provided.

SEC. 4. That in order to ascertain the depth of water through such outlet or pass, and to determine whether the said Eads or his associates, or his or their assigns, or his or their legal representatives, are entitled to claim compensation under the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, on each notification by the said Eads or his legal representatives that any required depth of water has been established as aforesaid, immediately to appoint three commissioners, who shall be selected from the Army, Navy, or Coast Survey, to examine into the facts, and make a report thereof to him; if from such report it shall appear that the said Eads, his associates, or legal representatives, have secured and continuously maintained a depth of water through any such outlet or pass from and after the date of such notification entitling him to payment under the provisions of this act, the President of the United States shall so certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating the amount due under this act to said Eads or his legal representatives; and thereupon, at the times hereinafter provided, the said Secretary of the Treasury shall draw his warrant on the Treasurer of the United States for such amount, payable to said Eads or his legal representatives.

SEC. 5. That to secure the Government against the expenditure of money for any doubtful or temporary results from the proposed works of said Eads, it is expressly provided that the payments for the same shall be delayed as follows, and that they shall be conditioned likewise on the permanency of the respective depths of water hereinbefore stipulated being established and maintained as hereinbefore provided up to the respective dates of payment; and it shall be the duty of the commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States to inform themselves of the actual and permanent depths of water, and the periods during which the same have been constantly maintained, and to certify fully the facts respecting the same. The conditions herein prescribed being complied with, the United States hereby promise and agree to pay to said Eads and his associates, or to his or their assigns, or to his or their legal representatives, $2,000,000 twelve months after so permanently obtaining twenty-two feet of water as aforesaid; $1,000,000 twelve months after so permanently obtaining twenty-four feet of water as aforesaid; $1,000,000 twelve months after so permanently obtaining twenty-six feet of water as aforesaid; $1,000,000 fifteen months after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $1,000,000 two years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $1,000,000 three years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $1,000,000 four years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $600,000 five years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $600,000 six years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $600,000 seven years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $600,000 eight years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $600,000 nine years after so permanently obtaining twenty-eight feet of water as aforesaid; $11,000,000 being the total amount herein authorized to be paid for the proposed improvement and maintenance thereof; and the necessary amounts of money to meet the foregoing obligations of the United States are hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 6. That any person maliciously or intentionally injuring said works, or interfering with the construction thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be tried for such offense before the district court of the United States for the district wherein such offense shall be committed; and, if found guilty, he shall be liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000, or to imprisonment for not more than two years, or to both fine and imprisonment as aforesaid, for each offense.

SEC. 7. That in case of death or other disability of said Eads before the completion of said works, the same may be prosecuted and completed by his legal representatives with the same powers, rights, obligations, liabilities, and compensation as if done by him in person.

SEC. 8. That the said Eads and his associates may have the right to use any materials on the public lands of the United States, within twenty miles of the mouth of the Mississippi River, that shall be suitable for, and may be needed in, the construction of said works: Provided, That said right may be limited or withheld by the President of the United States if he deems it contrary to the public interest.

Mr. HURLBUT. My friend from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] and myself desire to offer certain amendments to our respective propositions. If in order, I will now offer mine, and then the gentleman from Iowa can offer his to his bill. I will state the substance of my amendments, which are to make the first payment $1,000,000, instead of $2,000,000, and to provide that the outlet or pass shall have a width on its surface of not less than twelve hundred feet, instead of six hundred feet, as proposed by the bill.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made those amendments will be regarded as adopted.

No objection was made.

Mr. MCCRARY. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] desires to offer two amendments to my proposed substitute.

Mr. GARFIELD. How is that? If amendments are in order, I ask permission to offer the one which I have had read; otherwise I must object to any amendment.

Mr. MCCRARY. I cannot accept part of a bargain without the whole of it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] has offered amendments to his bill.

The SPEAKER. That was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCCRARY. I consented to it on condition that I might also offer amendments to my bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope no gentleman will object to these amendments.

The SPEAKER. These amendments, corresponding as the Chair understood to the amendments made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] on his bill, were allowed to be offered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MCCRARY. The amendments of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] are a part of those to which I referred.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will consider them as entitled to come in.

Mr. GARFIELD. As these amendments are desired by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] for the purpose merely of perfecting his own proposition, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Before reading the proposed amendments the Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That a ship-canal, to connect the Mississippi River with the Gulf of Mexico, commencing at some convenient point on the Mississippi River below Fort Saint Philip, on the east side of said river, and terminating at some convenient point in Breton Pass, in the Gulf of Mexico, shall be constructed and maintained at the expense and under the supervision and control of the Government of the United States; and for this purpose the Secretary of War shall cause to be made, in the most expeditious manner, a thorough, detailed, and final survey and location of said canal. The survey and report of the engineers assigned to this duty shall exhibit complete plans and specifications of the work in the construction of such canal; and the estimates of the cost of each portion of the work shall accompany and form part of the report of such survey; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of such survey.

SEC. 2. That the dimensions of said canal shall not be less than two hundred feet wide at the bottom throughout the trunk, and with not less than twenty-five feet in depth of water, with guard-gates, waste-weirs, locks, lock-houses, basins, bridges, and other erections and fixtures as may be necessary for the safe and convenient navigation of the said canal; and that the location of said canal shall be that indicated in the report of the engineers.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War shall cause said canals to be made and constructed through the lands indicated in the report of the engineers.

SEC. 4. That said canal shall at all times, night and day, be open to the free use and navigation of all vessels and craft belonging to the United States or any of its citizens, and, until otherwise provided, to all nations in commercial amity with the United States, free from toll or charges; that after its completion, said canal shall be maintained in good order and repair at the expense of the United States, and operated under the supervision of an officer to be detailed by the Secretary of War for said duty, and under his orders; and said canal shall be a military, naval, postal, and public highway, connecting the Mississippi River and the Gulf of Mexico; that the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States be extended and established over said canal to the same extent as it exists over the navigable waters of the United States connected thereby. The Secretary of War shall have power to establish all needful rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, concerning the use and navigation thereof; and a copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the United States district court for the district of Louisiana; and printed copies of said rules shall be framed and hung in a conspicuous place on board all canal and river tow-boats, as well as in the offices at either end of the canal; also, in the post-office and custom-house at New Orleans: Provided, That Congress may at any time revise or abrogate such rules.

SEC. 5. That no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the construction of said Fort Saint Philip Canal until a valid title to the lands for the site and appurtenances of said canal, as indicated in the report of the engineers, including a strip of land not less than one thousand yards on each side of said canal, and also all such lands as may be required for defensive works by the United States, shall be vested in the United States, and until the State of Louisiana shall cede its jurisdiction over said lands for the construction of said canal, and shall also duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said lands, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof.

SEC. 6. That the total cost of said canal shall not exceed $8,000,000; and no money shall be expended or liability incurred by the United States for construction until the entire work is put under contract in accordance with this act, at such prices as to secure the completion of the whole for a sum in the aggregate of not more than $8,000.000. And a sum necessary to complete said canal, not exceeding the said sum of $8,000,000, is hereby appropriated in installments of not more than one-third of the aggregate cost in any one year.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War shall, on the receipt of the survey and report aforesaid, and without unnecessary delay, advertise for bids to construct said canal for such time and in such newspapers as he may think sufficient; and he shall award the contract to the lowest and best responsible bidder or bidders, who shall give bond with sureties to the satisfaction of said Secretary that the work shall be done according to the stipulations of such contract: Provided, That no bid shall be received except the same is accompanied with a deposit with the said Secretary of the sum of $15,000, which sum shall be forfeited to the United States and paid into the Treasury thereof in case such bidder fails, for a period of thirty days after notice that his bid has been accepted, to make a contract in accordance with the terms of his bid and give security as required by this act: Provided further, That the contractor or contractors shall perform their work according to the plans and specifications of the Engineer Department and under the directions thereof: And provided further, That said canal shall be fully completed for use within a period of three years from the commencement thereof, and that the entire cost of such canal shall not exceed the sum of $8,000,000.

SEC. 8. That the United States reserve the right to modify the conditions and terms of the use of said canal, or to amend, alter, or repeal this act, if the public interest shall hereafter require it.

Mr. McCRARY. Two of the amendments which I send to the desk are amendments of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE,] and there is one other of my own. So far as I know there is no objection to these amendments.

The SPEAKER. They will be considered as modifications of the gentleman's substitute.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 6 by adding in line 1 after the word "canal" these words: "lock-houses, basins, bridges, breakwaters, harbors, and other erections, and fixtures as may be necessary for the safe and convenient navigation of the said canal;" so that the section will read:

That the total cost of said canal lock-houses, basins, bridges, breakwaters, harbors, and other erections and fixtures as may be necessary for the safe and convenient navigation of the said canal shall not exceed $8,000,000; and no money shall be expended or liability incurred by the United States for construction until the entire work is put under contract in accordance with this act, at such prices as to secure the completion of the whole for a sum in the aggregate of not more than $8,000,000, &c.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, this amendment will be considered as agreed to, as a modification of the substitute.

The second amendment was read, as follows:

Amend section 6 by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That no part of the $8,000,000 herein appropriated shall be used in the purchase of the lands for the site and appurtenances of said canal nor for the strip of land on either side of said canal, as provided for in section 5.

The SPEAKER. This modification will be agreed to, there being no objection.

The last amendment offered by Mr. McCRARY was read, as follows:

After the word "aforesaid" in line 2 of section 7, strike out the word "and" and insert "if the same shall show a practicable route for said canal;" so that the section will read:

That the Secretary of War shall, on the receipt of the survey and report aforesaid, if the same shall show a practicable route for said canal, without unnecessary delay, advertise for bids to construct said canal for such time and in such newspapers as he may think sufficient, &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and this modification will be made. The question is now on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] for the bill of the committee.

Mr. KASSON. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. When will the previous question exhaust itself?

The SPEAKER. It will exhaust itself upon the third reading of which ever bill the House may order to be engrossed.

Mr. GARFIELD. At that time will a motion to recommit with instructions be in order?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should not be called and seconded, it would be.

Mr. HURLBUT. Yes; any dilatory motion will be in order then.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 89, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Arthur, Atkins, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buffinton, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. So the substitute of Mr. McCRARY was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, said: On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FOSTER. If he were present he would vote "ay," while I should vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for the third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. McCRARY. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to ask a parliamentary question. If the House should refuse to second the previous question, will it be in order for me to move to recommit the bill with instructions that the committee report immediately the bill that I desired to present as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It would.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—ayes 81, noes 66.

The question recurring on ordering the main question,

Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 136, nays 90, not voting 63; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCRARY. I move to amend the title so it will read as follows:

A bill to provide for the construction of the Fort Saint Philip Canal in the State of Louisiana, and its maintenance as a national public highway.

The amendment to the title was adopted.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the title was amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PHILLIPS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD some remarks on the bill just passed. (See Appendix.)

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, this being private-bill day.

Mr. CONGER. Will there be another day for private bills this session?

The SPEAKER. There will not, because next Friday the rule will apply by which a motion to suspend the rules will be in order during the last ten days of the session.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I remember, the House has passed one resolution for final adjournment and the Senate another?

The SPEAKER. The House and the Senate finally agreed on the same resolution.

Mr. CONGER. There is a bill pending before the House in the morning hour on private-bill day.

The SPEAKER. Yes; the bill in relation to Rollin White. That bill is in the morning hour to-day. If the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar that bill will not be considered. If the House shall refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, it will come up in the morning hour.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This being objection day, by going into Committee of the Whole we will pass a number of bills; and it will be the last objection day we will have this session.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, it was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. POTTER in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The bills on the Private Calendar will be read in their order, beginning with the bill H. R. No. 3184.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there was a bill being considered when the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar last rose. It had been read.

The CHAIRMAN. This being objection day and it being open to any member to object to any bill as read in its order, the bill under consideration when the House was last in Committee of the Whole, that day not being objection day, would not have preference.

J. W. BURBRIDGE AND R. S. MONTGOMERY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3184) for the relief of J. W. Burbridge & Co., and R. H. Montgomery.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must ask for the reading of the report in this and in every other case, where there is a report.

The report was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This is quite a large claim, and I understand there is some question as to whether it should be allowed or not. I object.

NOLAN S. WILLIAMS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3185) for the relief of Nolan S. Williams, executor of Alfred A. Williams, late of New Orleans.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

EDWARD H. CALVERT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward H. Calvert.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Edward H. Calvert, of the District of Columbia, the sum of $1,500, to be in full and complete payment of rent for, and damages done to, the property of Edward H. Calvert, on Good Hope Hill, in the District of Columbia, known during the late war as Fort Wagner, and occupied from 1862 to the end of the war by Federal troops.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOSEPH COUNCIL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama, to sum of $1,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be in full payment and satisfaction of said Council's claim for raising, repairing, and delivering the rebel torpedo boat Saint Patrick to the navy-yard at Pensacola, Florida.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

LOUISVILLE AND BARDSTOWN TURNPIKE COMPANY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company, with amendments by the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. READ. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot agree to the proposition of this bill.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, said: Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who objected to this bill, is now present. I understand that he does not object to the bill with the amendment reported from the committee.

The bill directs the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army to audit, adjust, and pay such sums as he may deem proper and just to the president, directors, and company of the Bardstown and Louisville Turnpike Company for two bridges on said road, one over Salt River, the other over Floyd's Fork, burned and destroyed by the order of General Nelson, in command at the time of the United States troops in Kentucky, as a military necessity, on the 22d day of September, 1862, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided that the whole amount allowed under this act shall not exceed the sum of $13,600.

The amendment reported from the Committee on War Claims was to strike out the words—

For two bridges on said road, one over Salt River, the other over Floyd's Fork, burned and destroyed by the order of General Nelson, in command at the time of the United States troops in Kentucky, as a military necessity, on the 22d day of September, 1862, and insert in lieu thereof the following: To make compensation for two bridges on the road of said company, one over Salt River, the other over Floyd's Fork, constructed for the military service by said company by advice of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. With that amendment I withdraw my objection.

No further objection being made, the bill and amendment were laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

TREADWELL S. AYRES.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3186) for the relief of Treadwell S. Ayres.

The bill was read. It authorizes and requires the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Treadwell S. Ayres, of Memphis, Tennessee, the sum of $5,995, in full compensation for his building in Memphis occupied by United States military authorities in said city under contract made with competent military authorities during the late war to pay rent for the occupation of such building.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2891) for the relief of Treadwell S. Ayres, of Memphis, Tennessee, having considered the same, report:

That the said Ayres was, in January, 1864, and for some time previous, the owner of a certain building or block of buildings in the city of Memphis, Tennessee, on Second street, of said city, seventy-four feet front, one hundred and forty-eight feet deep, four stories high, with an iron front, valued at about $100,000, built in the year 1860, and known as "Ayres's building;" that on or about the 6th of January, 1863, Captain A. R. Eddy, assistant quartermaster, United States Army, who was then on duty at Memphis and properly charged with the duty of furnishing quarters and offices for the various Army officers on duty at that point, by his agent and clerk in charge of the rental department of the quartermaster's department at Memphis, contracted with the said Ayres for the rental of such rooms in the said "Ayres's building" as might be required for the use of the pay and other departments of the United States Army at Memphis for such length of time as might be desired, agreeing to pay therefor such rent as might be reasonable and just.

It appears that nineteen rooms of said building were used by the Pay Department and for courts-martial, and claim is made for compensation, as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO T. S. AYRES,	DR.
To rent of rooms in "Ayres's building," Memphis, for the use of United States Pay Department and courts-martial from 6th January, 1863, to 14th February, 1865:
Rooms Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, offices, second story, twenty-five months, at $30 per month each	$4,500 00
Rooms Nos. 7 and 8, offices, second story, from 15th January, 1863, to 15th February, 1864, thirteen months, at $30 per month each	780 00
Rooms Nos. 9 and 10, second story, offices, from January 6, 1863, to April 10, 1863, three months, at $30 per month each	180 00
Rooms Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, third story, from January, 1863, to 14th February, 1865, twenty-five months, at $15 per month each	1,500 00
Rooms Nos. 17, 18, 19, third story, from January 6, 1863, to 15th February, 1864, thirteen months, at $15 per month each	385 00
Rooms Nos. 11, 12, nine months, at $15 per month	270 00
	7,815 00

T. S. AYRES.

Your committee find that this claim was presented to the Quartermaster-General, who reported against it solely on the ground that "Memphis was a hostile city captured from the enemy, and it and everything in it became prize of war," without the slightest regard to the fact that Memphis was within the lines of the Federal forces when the property of Mr. Ayres was taken under a contract. It was then presented to the Court of Claims, which decided, (volume 3, page 1)—

1. That the ownership of the property was in the claimant, and that the rent claimed for the time of its occupancy was just and reasonable;
2. That the loyalty of the claimant was fully established;
3. That the taking was an appropriation of property by the Army; and
4. That the court was excluded from adjudicating upon it by the express terms of the act of July 4, 1864.

The case was then withdrawn from the Court of Claims and presented to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department, to wit, the Third Auditor, who referred it to the Quartermaster-General for certification of the facts, as is the practice in such cases. The report of the Quartermaster-General was made July 20, 1870, who, though he did not deny the facts as set forth by the claimant, reported adversely to the allowance of the claim on the ground that "rent is not a quartermaster's store."

Your committee are clearly of opinion that there was an implied contract between Captain Eddy and the claimant for the payment of rent for the occupation of the building, and that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States vs. Anderson (9 Wallace, 56) covers this case, as Memphis was within the lines of the Federal forces when this property was taken. As to the question of contract the following testimony is given, taken before the Court of Claims:

"My name is Edward R. Hill. I am, by occupation, a book-keeper. I am forty-five years of age. I am a resident of Memphis and have been for the past seven years. I have no interest, direct or indirect, in the claim which is the subject of inquiry.

"I know the claimant in the above-entitled cause, and I am in no degree related to him. I state further that, on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1863, and prior to that date, I was engaged and employed in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, stationed at Memphis, Tennessee, and especially in what was called the rental department, under the direction and control of Captain A. R. Eddy, acting as United States quartermaster, &c.; that, on the 5th or 6th day of January, 1863, certain officers of the Army of the United States Pay Department, Majors Judd, Brown, Farrish, Gould, Osgood, and others, with clerks and guards, arrived in Memphis, and applied to Captain A. R. Eddy, acting quartermaster, for rooms or offices in which they could proceed to pay off the troops of the United States Army in and about Memphis, &c., when said Captain A. R. Eddy directed me to find suitable rooms for said offices. I, under the direction and authority of Captain A. R. Eddy, acting quartermaster, applied to T. S. Ayres, owner of the "Ayres building," on Second street, Memphis, for the offices in his said building for the officers of the Pay Department, when said T. S. Ayres fully and freely agreed that the rooms or offices in said building should be so used and occupied by the officers of the United States Army, and on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1863, the said officers were placed in possession of the said offices by me and said T. S. Ayres, who furnished the keys of the several rooms and had them placed in order.

"I further state that said T. S. Ayres has been a citizen of Memphis, Tennessee, for the last twenty years; never engaged in rebellion, and has always been loyal to the Government of the United States; was then, and always has been, at his home in Memphis; never went beyond the lines of the military occupation of the United States Army or abandoned his property, but was then in actual possession of the same as owner.

"And I stated to said Ayers, when I applied for said offices, that he would be paid rent for the same, and under my said promise and assurance as to rent he consented to the use thereof, and gave me possession of the same; and said officers were placed in possession on the 6th day of January, 1863; and said offices were used and occupied by officers of Pay Department and courts-martial from that time until the 14th of February, 1865.

"I further state, that on the 12th day of January, 1363, after said offices were occupied by the Pay Department, and while they were in possession, certain officers of the Medical Department, surgeons of the United States Army, were about to select the said Ayres building for a hospital, when Major-General U. S. Grant, then in command at Memphis, at the instance and on application of the officers of the Pay Department, made an order, directing Major E. D. Judd, senior paymaster, to occupy the offices or rooms in the Ayres's building for pay department, &c. This order was made to prevent the use of same as a hospital, and to continue the officers of the Pay Department in possession.

"Said property, Ayres building, was never abandoned by the owner, or confiscated, or taken up by the rental department.

"I can state further that it was fully understood between Mr. Ayres and myself that he was to receive rent for his rooms or offices. It was merely accommodation on the part of Mr. Ayres in giving up the rooms."

Your committee are clearly of opinion that the claimant is legally and equitably entitled to compensation for the property so taken and used, and accordingly report the accompanying bill, paying for rooms 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, at the rate of $20 per month, and for rooms 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19 at the rate of $15 per month, in all amounting to the sum of $5,995, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Here the committee informally arose, and Mr. CESSNA took the chair as Speaker pro tempore to receive a MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes on the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. WEST, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. STEVENSON to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. BAYARD to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 716) for the better government of the Navy of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 535) for the relief of the owners of the Haytian brig Margaretta or their legal representatives; and

A bill (S. No. 252) to remove the disabilities of John Julius Gutherie.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 1019) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, in the State of California;

The bill (H. R. No. 3005) for the relief of the heirs of Mary B. Belfield, of Virginia; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3575) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands in certain portions of the States of Minnesota and Iowa.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar then resumed its session.

JOHN B. TYLER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1660) for the relief of John B. Tyler, of Kentucky.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John B. Tyler, of Princeton, Caldwell County, Kentucky, the sum of $120, in full for the loss of a horse, his private property, which was killed on the battle-field of Stone River, on the 31st day of December, 1862; said John B. Tyler at the time being in the service of the United States Army.

The report of the Committee on War Claims was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1660) for the relief of John B. Tyler, of Kentucky, having had the same under consideration report:

That the said Tyler, now of Princeton, Caldwell County, Kentucky, was during the late war the captain of Company C, Eleventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteers. That while in said service with said regiment he was ordered by Lieutenant Colonel Motley, then commanding the regiment, to take command of the same as acting major just prior to the battle of Stone River, on account of the absence of the two senior captains, and that in obedience to such orders he took command as acting major.

By the regulations of the Army, a captain of infantry was not entitled to a horse, and the said Tyler was ordered by Colonel Motley to procure one at once, as the enemy were in strong force immediately in front of their camp, and a battle was momentarily expected. That the said Tyler purchased a horse, paying $160, on the morning of the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862, and in the afternoon of said day, while in action at the head of his command, he received a severe wound in the right thigh, which made it necessary that he should be carried to the hospital. The horse, saddle, and bridle were retained and used by some officer, and during the battle the horse was killed, and Tyler has never received pay or compensation for either horse, saddle, or bridle.

Your committee find, from the evidence submitted, that said horse was not a Government horse. Claim was referred to the Third Auditor of the Treasury, which was refused on the ground that Tyler, being a captain, was not entitled to be mounted upon a private horse at that time; and believing that Tyler is entitled to compensation for the loss of the horse, saddle, and bridle, report back the bill and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

D. R. HAGGARD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2939) to compensate D. R. Haggard for six months' services as colonel of the Fifth Kentucky United States Cavalry Volunteers.

The preamble to the bill recites that D. R. Haggard, of Burkesville, Cumberland County, Kentucky, was, on the 1st day of October, 1861, commissioned a colonel of the Fifth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, United States Army, in the war of the late rebellion; that he was shortly thereafter transferred to cavalry service, and was immediatey thereafter put into and did engage in the active service of his country, and did continue in said active service to the close of the war; that he was not mustered in the service of the Army until after six months from the date of his said commission and engagement in active service aforesaid; and that he has never received any pay or compensation for said six months' service prior to his muster-in.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to said D. R. Haggard the sum of $1,422, which shall be in full for all sums due said Haggard for said services, and all perquisites.

The report of the Committee on War Claims was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2939) for the relief of David R. Haggard, submit the following report:

David R. Haggard was appointed colonel of the Fifth Kentucky Infantry by Brigadier-General Robert Anderson, commanding department, by virtue of authority from the President, October 1, 1861, and he at once proceeded to organize a regiment, and in twenty days had a force of eight hundred men in camp on his own farm, and before the end of the month went into the field under General Thomas. The regiment was changed to cavalry, and he was commissioned colonel of the Fifth Kentucky Cavalry December 4, 1861. He applied to be mustered by the officer who mustered Colonel Gudes's regiment, at Columbia, and no other opportunity offered until the muster of the regiment, March 31, 1862. He was a most faithful and efficient officer, and was only paid from the time of muster, and not paid for six months previous thereto. He never received or asked anything for expense of organizing the regiment, most of which was formed by him.

The committee recommend the amount of six months' pay and allowance, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

J. C. HANNUM.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3187) for the relief of J. C. Hannum.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I object.

SEBASTIAN REICHERT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 419) for the relief of Sebastian Reichert.

Mr. HUNTON. A bill precisely like this has passed both Houses of Congress, and has received the approval of the President; I therefore object to its consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. COTTON. That motion, if it prevailed, would cause the committee to rise, and therefore I must object to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. What objection can there be to disposing of the bill in that way?

Mr. LAWRENCE. If we do that, it will cause the committee to rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The only mode in which we can get this bill to the House, so that it may be disposed of, is to move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will observe that that would require the committee to rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; it would not require the committee to rise.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is not this objection day?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then we cannot discuss this bill at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. We cannot discuss it, but we can strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. DUNNELL. I submit that that motion is equivalent to an objection to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless that motion can be made we can never get a bill out of a committee on objection days with an adverse recommendation at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course if there is objection the committee cannot do it. If there be an objection to a bill on objection days it is passed over.

Mr. COTTON. I object to the bill.

Mr. DONNAN. Is it not in order to move that it be reported adversely to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope that by unanimous consent the bill will be reported to the House, where it can be disposed of.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I make the point of order that on objection day, under the rules of the House, the only action the committee can take on any bill is when it is objected to, to pass to the consideration of the next bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so holds.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I call for the reading of the report in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a Senate bill, and is not accompanied by a report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that by unanimous consent the enacting clause can be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman will observe that there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will state that on last objection day, I asked unanimous consent for something to be done, to which the gentleman from Indiana objected, and the ruling of the Chair then was that it was not competent for the committee to do anything but lay a bill aside, with a favorable recommendation, even by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to pass on that point, as the gentleman from Iowa and others have objected to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought it was so manifestly proper that the bill should be reported to the House and disposed of there, that no gentleman would object to my motion.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Cannot the Committee of the Whole order the bill to be laid aside, to be reported adversely?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to this bill it must be passed over, and the committee must proceed to the consideration of the next bill on the Calendar?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I make the motion that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House adversely.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, a bill cannot be acted on adversely on objection day.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that there is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be unanimous consent that the bill be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that course being pursued?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

INGALLS B. ANDREWS.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2903) for the relief of Ingalls B. Andrews.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to correct the record in his Department, wherein it appears that Ingalls B. Andrews, Company G, Thirty-first Maine Volunteers, is returned as a deserter; and that the said Ingalls B. Andrews be, and he is hereby, exonerated from the charge of desertion.

The Committee on Military Affairs report an amendment, to add to the bill the following:

And shall be entitled to the same pay and bounty as though no such charge had been entered against him.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2703) for the relief of Ingalls B. Andrews, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

Claimant was enrolled in Company G, Thirty-first Regiment Maine Volunteers, February 24, 1864, and was arrested as a deserter on the 30th of March, 1864. This soldier makes affidavit that after he had enlisted he reported for duty at Augusta, Maine, and that before he was mustered into service he obtained leave of his captain to go to his home for a short time; that he went accordingly, but had no papers with him to show his leave of absence; that a man who knew he had enlisted arrested him and returned him to camp as a deserter, and secured thirty dollars as a reward therefor. He rejoined his company and was mustered into service; no charges were ever preferred against him; he went to the field with his command, and was so seriously wounded at Burnside's mine, Petersburgh, Virginia, that he was discharged on account of injuries so received. He avers his inability to furnish his captain's affidavit that he gave him leave to go home at the time he was arrested, because that officer had removed to the Western States and he cannot find his residence. Citizens of his vicinity vouch for his good character, and a lieutenant of his company and the colonel of his regiment say there were no better soldiers than him. His bounty, except the first installment, has been withheld, and he never even received any monthly pay except the first month, being in the hospital when the command was paid. The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

J. SCOTT PAYNE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 2771) for the relief of J. Scott Payne, second lieutenant Sixth United States Cavalry, late first lieutenant Fifth United States Cavalry.

The bill provides that upon the occurrence of a vacancy in the grade of first lieutenant in the Fifth United States Cavalry, J. Scott Payne, formerly first lieutenant in said regiment and now second lieutenant of the Sixth United States Cavalry, shall be appointed to the grade of first lieutenant in said Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, with date of commission and relative rank in the Army held by him on the 12th day of September, 1868; provided that the act grants no back pay or additional pay in any manner whatever.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House bill No. 771, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

In the month of June, 1868, J. Scott Payne, then first lieutenant Fifth United States Cavalry, tendered his letter of resignation, to take effect December 1, of same year. Subsequently charges were preferred against him, and he was summoned to appear before a court-martial at Washington, District of Columbia, early in August, 1868. Pending the trial he applied to the then Secretary of War for the withdrawal of his resignation, which was declined. The court-martial acquitted him of the charges, but the resignation which he had asked to withdraw was accepted September 12, 1868.

On the 30th of January, 1869, the War Department issued Special Order No. 25, as follows:

[Extract.]

* * * * * * *

8. By direction of the President so much of the Special Orders No. 220, paragraph 4, from this office, dated September 14, 1868, as accepts the resignation of First Lieutenant J. Scott Payne, Fifth United States Cavalry, to take effect September 12, 1868, is hereby revoked.

* * * * * * *

By command of General Grant:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

It is claimed that the President could not restore to service an officer who had resigned by revoking the acceptance of his resignation, and no effect has been given to Special Order No. 25, above stated. Last year the President appointed Payne a second lieutenant in the Sixth United States Cavalry. The bill before the committee provides in case of the first vacancy that this officer be reinstated in the grade which he held in his old regiment, thus giving effect to the special order of the War Department of January 30, 1869.

The bill is, however, imperative in its terms. The committee recommend striking out of lines 6 and 7 of the bill the words "shall be appointed," and inserting after the word cavalry in the fourth line the words "the President is hereby authorized to appoint;" and being so amended, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The question was upon adopting the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of obtaining a decision so as to establish some system of practice in these matters, I desire to submit to the Chair the question whether, if it is in order to vote upon an amendment reported from a committee, it is not also in order to vote upon an amendment to strike out the enacting clause of a bill?

Mr. MAYNARD. I should dislike to differ very much with the present occupant of the chair. But I would suggest that, this being objection day, when a bill is not objected to it should be reported to the House in the form recommended by the committee; that is with the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman means that, if there be no objection, the bill with the amendment be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is what I mean.

Mr. DONNAN. Allow me to suggest that this bill is reported to the House with an amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs. Now, if there be no objection, why should not the bill and amendment be reported to the House?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Committee of the Whole must act upon the amendment.

Mr. DONNAN. I do not think any action and vote are necessary.

Mr. MAYNARD. If a bill with an amendment cannot be acted upon, then the committee in charge of the bill will hereafter report a new bill embracing the amendment. The whole object of objection day is to enable bills to pass through as they are reported from committees.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection to this bill with the amendment, it will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

No objection being made, the bill, as amended, was accordingly laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was House bill (No. 1718) relating to the equitable and legal rights of parties in possession of certain lands and improvements thereon in California, and to provide jurisdiction to determine those rights.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I object to the bill.

Mr. CESSNA. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection till the report can be read.

Mr. COBURN. I cannot.

Objection being made, the bill was passed over.

LETTA BAGLEY.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 388) granting a pension to Letta Bagley.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Letta Bagley, mother of James P. Bagley, late a private in Company E, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay a pension to her from the time when her name was dropped from the pension-roll.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Letta Bagley, for a pension, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report—

That it appears from the evidence in this case that in the year 1834 a young unmarried woman came to the place where the petitioner resided, gave birth to a boy, and when he was two or three weeks old she prevailed upon Mr. and Mrs. Bagley to adopt him as their own son, and give him their name. The mother then left without telling her name, and the petitioner has never heard from her since, and this boy was treated in all respects as an own son, and was given the name of James P. Bagley.

That James P. Bagley enlisted in September, 1861, in Company E, Twenty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, and was killed at the battle of Cedar Mountain, August 9, 1862. That James worked faithfully for his parents before enlistment, and sent the petitioner a portion of his wages as a soldier. That petitioner did not apply for a pension on account of the death of her son for many years, as the proceeds of the little farm, which was sold, because they could not carry it on after James left, enabled them to live without a pension, but the husband of Letta being more than seventy years old, and a cripple with but one leg for many years, application was made and a pension granted August 30, 1869. This was continued till December 4, 1872, when the petitioner's name was dropped from the pension-roll, because James was not her own son; and that the application was made to the Pension Office without any thought of doing wrong.

Your committee believe that this applicant is justly entitled to be considered and treated as the actual mother of James, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill herewith submitted.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SAMUEL HENDERSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1820) granting a pension to Samuel Henderson.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel Henderson, late a private in Company G, of the One hundred and second Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1820) granting a pension to Samuel Henderson, having considered the same, submit the following report:

The petitioner enlisted in Company G, One hundred and second Ohio Volunteers, February 23, 1864, and was discharged the service March 13, 1865, on surgeon's certificate of disability.

It appears from the evidence presented in this case, that after the petitioner had come in off of picket duty, and was sitting upon a high stool, leaning forward with his elbows resting on his knees, and his head resting on his hands, one Jacob Lenoker, a comrade, jumped astride the petitioner's neck, jerking him forward and doubling him up, with his head and feet together, and throwing him about in such a manner as to strain his spine and cords of his back and neck, so as to affect his back and kidneys to such an extent as to be scarcely able to get about, and as a final result lost the sight of his left eye, and leaving the sight of the right in an impaired condition. This in connection with the spinal affection, which has caused a large lump to grow on the right side of his back, just over the kidneys, and the curvature of the spine, so bad that he is obliged to walk crooked, entirely disqualifying him for manual labor.

The evidence in this case is clear and full that the soldier was injured as alleged, and the only reason why pension was denied by the Commissioner of Pensions is, that the petitioner was not considered as having received the injury while in the line of duty.

The injury having been received without any fault or negligence on the part of the petitioner, the committee are of the opinion that it was incident to the service, (see decisions of Hon. Thomas Ewing, April 10, 1849, and Hon. B. R. Cowen, January 4, 1873,) it being shown that he was in camp at the time the injury was received, and therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the bill for his relief.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

FREDERICK VOGEL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3189) granting a pension to Frederick Vogel.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Vogel, late assistant topographical engineer, Department of the Cumberland, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 651) granting a pension to Frederick Vogel, late assistant topographical engineer, Department of the Cumberland, having considered the same, make the following report:

The petitioner was assigned from civil life to duty as assistant topographical engineer. He claims a pension on account of a rupture and paralysis of the right side, caused by being thrown from his horse while in the line of duty.

The evidence presented in this case shows that while the petitioner was surveying the road from Hartsville to Lebanon, Tennessee, he was compelled to ford the Cumberland River, and that while crossing his horse was washed by the force of the current below the ford, and that in the struggle of his horse to climb the bank he was thrown from the saddle, with one foot fast in the stirrup; and that by this fall and the struggle of the horse was ruptured, and as a consequence thereof was stricken with paralysis.

The committee are of the opinion, from the evidence submitted in support of this claim, that the petitioner is entitled to pension, and therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill H. R. No. 651.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is there a session ordered for to-night?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And has the House made an order for a recess to be taken at half past four o'clock?

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. As there is no more time now before half past four o'clock than will suffice to pass in the House the bills that the Committee of the Whole has already acted on, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POTTER reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills, some with and some without amendment.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3095) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

REVISION OF POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill (H. R. No. 3608) to amend sections 245, 246, 247, and 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommited.

POST-ROADS.

Mr. PACKER also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill (H. R. No. 3609) to establish certain post-roads; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This is the general post-route bill, containing no legislation whatever. If there be no objection, it will be passed now without being read.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PACKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. Is not that the order only by sufferance?

The SPEAKER. O, no; by a direct and absolute rule of the House and by immemorial usage.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, with a recommendation that they pass, were ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward H. Calvert; and

A bill (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama.

LOUISVILLE AND BARDSTOWN TURNPIKE COMPANY.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of this bill. It involves an important principle, which may apply to other cases arising hereafter. I desire it shall be understood.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be laid aside till the other bills reported from the Committee of the Whole have been acted on.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, no; let us go on regularly.

The bill, as amended by the Committee of the Whole, was read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I raise the point that the hour has arrived for the recess.

The SPEAKER. The House has ordered that a session be held this evening, to be devoted to business from the Committee on the Public Lands, and that at half past four o'clock a recess be taken till half past seven o'clock.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What effect will the taking of the recess have with regard to the private bills reported from the Committee of the Whole and not yet acted on by the House?

The SPEAKER. They will come up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask that to-night, after the Committee on the Public lands have finished their business, the Committee on War Claims may be allowed to make reports, not for action, but to go to the Calendar.

Several members objected.

The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the House, according to order, took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. According to previous order, the House is in session for the purpose of hearing and considering reports from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As there does not appear to be a quorum in the House, I move that we take a recess for ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and a recess was taken accordingly.

The recess having expired, at twenty minutes to eight o'clock p. m. the House reassembled.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, this evening was assigned by the House last Monday morning for the purpose of hearing reports from the Committee on the Public Lands. We are here to-night with several bills we desire to report favorably for the action of the House. Some of them are subject to the point of order, and if gentlemen are strenuous on that matter they will be sent to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Report those first which do not go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish, however, to say to the House, of all the bills which have come before us we have carefully examined them and have sifted them out. We have weeded nine out of ten of them, and report none to the House except those which we think have merit. We therefore trust, unless there be some good reason for it, no bill will be sent to the Committee of the Whole on a point of order. The first bill I wish to offer to the consideration and approval of the House is a bill to carry out the provisions of the treaty of 1871 between Great Britain and the United States concerning land up in Washington Territory.

HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3351) to ascertain the possessory rights of the Hudson's Bay Company and other British subjects within the limits which were subject of the award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany under the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it pass.

The bill and preamble were read.

The preamble recites that it was stipulated by article 1 of the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 15th day of June, 1846, between the United States and Great Britain, that the line of boundary between the territories of the United States and Her Britannic Majesty, from the point on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude up to which it had already been ascertained, should be continued westward along said parallel of north latitude "to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's Island, and thence southerly through the middle of said channel and of Fuca Straits to the Pacific Ocean;" and by article 3 of the treaty aforesaid it was stipulated that "in the future appropriation of the territory south of the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, as provided in the first article of this treaty, the possessory rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, and of all British subjects who may be in the occupation of land or other property lawfully acquired within the said territory, shall be respected;" and by article 34 of the treaty concluded at Washington, on the 8th day of May, 1871, the question of where "the boundary which runs southerly through the middle of the channel aforesaid" should be located was submitted to His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, whose decision was to be final and without appeal; and by the award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, of October 21, 1872, said boundary was established, and it now devolves upon the United States to discharge its treaty obligations.

The bill in its first section then provides that a commissioner be appointed by the President of the United States, to make and report to the Secretary of the Interior a list of all British subjects who on the 15th day of June, 1846, were in the occupation of land, lawfully acquired within the limits which were the subject of the award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany, together with a description of the land actually occupied by each at said date; and said commissioner shall proceed to the vicinity of the land in question, and there receive proof of the occupancy of such land and of the mode by which such occupancy was acquired, after first giving reasonable notice as to the said matters to be so reported by him. Such proof shall consist of oral testimony under oath and such documentary proofs as the said occupants may present. The testimony of all witnesses shall be reduced to writing, and all documentary proof offered by the parties and received by the commissioner shall be attached to the deposition of the party offering such proofs, which testimony and proofs shall be submitted by said commissioner with his report, and such report shall be subject to review by the Secretary of the Interior, whose action thereon shall be final. For the purposes of the act, the said commissioner shall have authority to administer oaths and take testimony.

The second section provides that said commissioner shall receive for his services ten dollars per diem, together with traveling expenses at the rate of ten cents per mile, for the distance actually traveled in the execution of said commission; and the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated from any unappropriated money in the Treasury to defray such expenses.

The third section provides that all British subjects whose claims shall be approved by the Secretary, as provided in section 1 of this act, shall be allowed to purchase from the United States the land so designated at any time within one year from such approval, at the ordinary minimum price per acre where the lands are situated outside railroad limits, and at double minimum price where the lands are within railroad limits.

The fourth section provides that such entries shall be according to legal subdivisions, so as to include the improvements of such occupants; and where two or more parties shall have improvements on the same smallest legal subdivision, they may make a joint entry thereof; provided that in case entry and payment are not made within one year from the date of such approval by the Secretary of the Interior, then all possessory rights named in article 3 of the treaty of June 15, 1846, shall be considered forfeited, and the lands shall thereafter be deemed and treated as a part of the public domain, to be disposed of as other lands.

The fifth section provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to make all needful regulations to give effect to the provisions of the act.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Secretary of State called the attention of the Secretary of the Interior to a communication from Sir Edward Thornton, the British minister, who, under instructions—and I am now reading from the report of the Secretary of the Interior—"under instructions from his government has asked the consideration of the case of those persons, subjects of Great Britain, who had settled upon the islands between the continent and Vancouver's Island, which were confirmed to the United States by the decision of the Emperor of Germany. And the Secretary of State, after calling the attention of the Department to this subject, has inquired whether he may be justified in saying to the British minister that this Department will be prepared to recommend to Congress any legislation on this subject at the approaching session, and also to ask, in case any legislation will be recommended, that if there be no objections, he may be informed of the provisions which Congress will be asked to enact into a law." The Secretary of the Interior accordingly recommends this bill as draughted here should be passed by Congress into law.

The fact is the law is a draught made partly in the State Department and partly in the Department of the Interior upon consultation between them, and inasmuch as it is to carry out provisions of the treaty, we ask it may be passed, and unless some gentleman wants further information about it or wants to say something respecting it, I shall now ask the bill be passed.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. If the gentleman has no objection I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is not possible to secure the services of some officer of the Government who is now up in that country, and whether it would not be cheaper, instead of appointing this commission?

Mr. TOWNSEND. On consultation between the two Departments this was found to be the cheapest way which could be adopted.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. But the fees provided here in the long run will make a good deal.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This has been proposed by the two Departments after a careful consideration.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. That is all right enough, but could we not get along by employing some of these officers who are now up in that country to do this work without further compensation?

Mr. CONGER. May I ask the gentleman whether the bill applies to any other than these lands which are stated?

Mr. TOWNSEND. To none others except those obtained under the award of the Emperor of Germany.

Mr. CONGER. What necessity is there then to make a distinction about railroad lands?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will yield now to the gentleman from Washington Territory, who will explain that matter.

Mr. McFADDEN. This a bill of great importance in regard to the interests of the people in that region. The land in those islands awarded to us under the decree of the Emperor of Germany lies within the limits of the waters of Puget Sound. It has been in contest for a long time; and the necessity for this bill originates in a treaty made in 1846, commonly known as the Ashburton treaty. We have invariably claimed those islands as belonging to the Territory of Washington; and at an early period after the settlement and organization of the Territory of Washington there was an act passed by the Legislature of the Territory incorporating those islands as part of Washington County. They have been settled upon and improved by American citizens who have been living there for twelve, fifteen, and seventeen years, who have made there their homes and valuable improvements, but who have been unable to get surveys of those lands by reason of the difficulty which sprang up in the adjustment of the northern boundary between the American and British possessions.

Mr. Campbell, who represented the American Government, and the British Commission, when they reached the Straits of Rosario, quarreled; the British claiming that those straits constituted the boundary line, while we claimed that the northern waters known as the Channel De Haro were the true boundary, settled and covered by the treaty of 1846.

Now all surveys upon those islands have been suspended. The President's proclamation has gone forth excluding those lands from settlement, and unless provision is made for their survey by the appointment of a commissioner who can go upon the ground and ascertain who were settlers there in 1846, at the date of the treaty, and the nature, character, and extent of the occupation of the lands which they claim, those lands would be claimed and absorbed by the subjects of Great Britain instead of being held by American citizens. The truth of the matter is that there were but few British subjects on the lands at the date of the treaty. And it will be seen by this bill that the construction given to the treaty by the Secretary of State and concurred in by the Secretary of the Interior is that no British subjects are entitled as settlers to lands upon these islands, except those who were the occupants of those lands at the date of the treaty in 1846. This measure is a measure of necessity, and I have the assurance of the Secretary of the Interior that upon the passage of this bill those islands would be at once surveyed, and these American citizens who for fifteen or seventeen years have been living upon this extreme northern frontier, the most remote province connected with the American Union, will be enabled to perfect titles to their lands. If it goes over things will remain in statu quo. British subjects will be asserting their claims; conflicts will arise, and there is no telling what the result will be.

Mr. CONGER. I had risen and was about to make a remark or two on this question, but as the Delegate from Washington Territory seemed desirous of speaking I yielded to him. I wish to say that it seems to me that if there were any rights acquired under that treaty, possessory rights or any other rights to the lands on these islands, they were acquired and would be held under the treaty, independent of the rule of payment which would be applied to these people as purchasers. Perhaps the committee could inform the House in regard to that matter.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They are held exactly under the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. CONGER. The treaty as I understand it provides that the possessory rights of British subjects at the date of the treaty or at the time of the confirmation of the treaty of 1846 should be confirmed to them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Should be respected.

Mr. CONGER. Well, should be respected. Now, I do not know what sort of respect is shown for those rights, to say what men shall still occupy their lands to which they were entitled under the laws of Great Britain, but must pay for them, and pay for them just what they would have to pay for any other lands. If that is carrying out the treaty very well, let it be so. But if it is a little close Yankee trick to get a few shillings an acre for lands that belong to these people, I say it is unworthy of this House to do it in that way, as if it were confirming the rights of people under a treaty; because it is no more than aliens may do with reference to any lands which have been surveyed. For any alien may come now and buy land at ten shillings an acre.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have the treaty here.

Mr. CONGER. Before I yield the floor I wish to make another remark. It was in regard to these islands that the dispute arose as to their settlement by Americans which led to the reference of the matter to the Emperor of Germany. The British authorities then in possession forbade the Americans settling on the islands, and the Americans insisted upon their right to settle there, and the quarrel came near being one to be carried on by force between the respective settlers and the officials of the two governments. Now I have no idea that the size of these islands or the size of any of the islands which were submitted to this arbitration is so great that there have ever been any railroad lands granted upon them.

Mr. McFADDEN. The North Pacific Railroad have had these lands withdrawn from settlement. They have extended their line northerly along Puget Sound, striking the East Cascades by what is known as the Skaget Pass east of the mountains. There are now in the northern part of the Territory but two extreme points, one near the British possessions and the other near the mouth of the Chehalis River, that are actually outside of the limits of the lands withdrawn, unless it be a small portion of land east of the mountains which are open to homestead and pre-emption settlement.

Mr. CONGER. They come within the limits, then, by being so far from surveyed land?

Mr. McFADDEN. Certainly; within twenty miles.

Mr. CONGER. If that be so, it answers all I have to say upon this subject.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to call attention to one point further in the same line which has been presented by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and in fact I rose for the purpose of calling attention to the points which he suggested. The treaty of 1846, which designated the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, where it will be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia River as the boundary, after making that provision in article 2, provides in article 3 that in future appropriations of the territory south of the forty-ninth parallel, the possessory rights of the Hudson's Bay Company and of all British subjects who may be already in possession of land and other property lawfully acquired within said territory, shall be respected.

Now the treaty of Washington in article 34 provides, in pursuance of this article of the treaty of 1846, that the Emperor of Germany shall examine and determine, after a hearing of the case, where this line is, whether it is to be run through the Rosario Straits or through the Channel De Haro. He was, having regard to the above-mentioned article of the said treaty, to decide thereupon finally without appeal.

Now, the only point I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania is this: if it shall turn out as a matter of international law that the third article of the treaty of 1846 can be fairly said to be brought forward in its operation by reference to it in the article of the Washington treaty of 1870, would not the possessory rights provided for in the treaty of 1846 be brought forward also, so that those possessory rights as they were at the time the boundary line was finally determined by the Emperor of Germany would have to be respected by this Government? If that be so then it seems to me that we may possibly by a bill of this sort get into this complication. If we assume that no British subjects have any rights south of this line finally determined by the Emperor of Germany unless they were in actual possession in 1846 and had possessory rights at that time, we may say then that we will open all the lands to public entry no matter if they were in the actual occupation of British subjects at the time the Emperor of Germany made the award. Then there would arise undoubtedly behind that question a claim for indemnity. I only raise the point, because such claims have arisen under other provisions of the treaty. And so it has occurred to me that there is difficulty in opening these lands to public entry now, unless we recognize in some way the possessory rights of those who were in actual occupation at the date of the final award by the Emperor of Germany.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what we propose to do by this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman will allow me a word further. I understand this bill to provide that the claims of British subjects are only to be recognized as giving a right of entry; that is to say, that they may enter lands they may have occupied for twenty years by paying the minimum price; so that, in other words, it gives them the right of entry on the same terms as Americans might have it. But it seems to me that by the terms of the treaty of 1846 they were to be treated as being the actual owners of these lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The gentleman from Washington Territory [Mr. McFADDEN] is more familiar with this matter than I am, and I yield to him to answer the suggestions of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. McFADDEN. In answer to the point suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, I will say that it is hardly to be expected that the American Congress will go beyond the demands made by the British Government. The British minister has only claimed this right for the settlers who were on these lands at the date of the treaty of 1846. No claim has been presented beyond that. I take it that under the treaty stipulations entered into and the negotiations entered into between this Government and the British government, the title of the Puget Sound Company and of the Hudson's Bay Company to lands have been extinguished by actual purchase; so that no claim is left but those claims which belong in common to American citizens and British subjects who may have been in the occupation of lands on the islands of this archipelago at the date of the treaty of 1846.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The reason why my attention was called to this matter more especially was because recently I had my attention called to possessory claims which have been brought in here, and to a bill now pending before the House growing out of the final settlement of the northeastern boundary, where similar language was used in the treaty. No matter what the English minister may be willing to waive as to the claims in behalf of English subjects, still the right of British subjects may exist under the treaty; and certainly since the change of the boundary line, thus making them citizens of the United States, we ought to respect their rights whatever they may be. I only raised the point as a matter which caused some doubts in my own mind.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The British minister, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Interior have all considered this subject; and I do not think it worth while that we should now raise any doubts about it. I ask for a vote upon the bill.

Mr. BARBER. I desire to offer an amendment to which I do not think the gentleman will object.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think the amendment is a very proper one.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will hear it read.

Mr. BARBER. I propose to amend the last clause of section 1 of the bill by inserting after the words "authority to" the words "subpœna witnesses;" so that it will read:

For the purposes of this act the said commissioner shall have authority to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. As we have the most efficient of all public officers, our Army and Navy officers, on the Pacific coast, I would suggest to the gentleman that some one of them should be detailed for this duty. The multiplication of officers is always to be deplored, and in this instance there seems to be no necessity for it. If the gentleman will consent, I will propose to incorporate in this bill a provision that the officers of the Army and Navy on the Pacific coast shall be employed in this duty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I trust the gentleman will not press his motion. This matter has been thoroughly considered by two Departments of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not insist upon it.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS ON FORT ABERCROMBIE RESERVATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 3078) for the relief of settlers upon that portion of the old reservation of Fort Abercrombie subject to sale under the act entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of useless military reservations," approved February 24, 1871.

The bill provides that all settlers upon that portion of the old military reservation of Fort Abercrombie which lies on the east side of the Red River of the North, and which is subject to sale at its appraised value by the Secretary of the Interior, shall have the right to purchase one hundred and sixty acres each, including their respective improvements, at its appraised value, in cash, at any time within two years from the passage of this act; and that no quarter-section or other smaller legal subdivision of said land occupied by a bona fide settler as a homestead shall be exposed to public sale until after the expiration of two years from the passage of this act, anything in the act to provide for the disposition of useless military reservations, approved February 24, 1871, to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment reported from the committee was to amend the section so as to limit the time for the operation of this act to one year after its passage instead of two years as proposed by the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will state briefly the history of this matter. In 1871 the Congress of the United States passed a law providing that the Secretary of War should turn over to the Secretary of the Interior useless military reservations. Under that act a portion of the lands around Fort Abercrombie, amounting to some six thousand acres, was turned over to the Secretary of the Interior by the Secretary of War. Those lands have been appraised at from one dollar up to six dollars an acre. Some thirty-four persons settled upon this land, thinking that it had been entirely opened to settlement which had not been done. This bill provides that those settlers shall be allowed to enter upon and take possession of those lands upon paying to the Government the price at which the lands have been appraised. That is the amount of the bill.

Mr. COTTON. How much land is there?

Mr. TOWNSEND. A little less than six thousand acres.

Mr. COTTON. How much land is allowed to each settler?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not more than one quarter-section to any one settler, according to legal subdivisions.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to inquire if the committee has any knowledge about any conflict concerning the possessory rights of settlers?

Mr. AVERILL. This land lies in my district. I am acquainted with that section of the country. It is a small tract of land lying on the east side of the Red River of the North. There are a few settlers upon it, some of whom have been there many years. All that is asked is to quiet their titles so that they may have their homes undisturbed by speculators.

Mr. CONGER. Is there any conflict in regard to these lands?

Mr. AVERILL. None at all.

Mr. CONGER. Has any railroad been laid out through these lands?

Mr. AVERILL. There is no railroad laid out, none located, and none anticipated within fifty miles of these lands. It is outside of any contemplated railroad route.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA, MISSISSIPPI, ETC.

Mr. MOREY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3610) to place the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, and Arkansas on the same footing in regard to the disposition of public lands within their limits as the other States of the Union; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that from and after the 1st day of September, 1874, all acts of Congress relating to the sale of public lands, and granting pre-emption rights to actual settlers, then in force in the other States and Territories of the United States, shall, without further legislation, extend over and be in force in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, and Arkansas.

Mr. LOWE. How does it happen that the lands in these States are not now subject to the laws affecting other States?

Mr. MOREY. I will explain. By the act of June 21, 1866, the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida are made liable to homestead settlement only; there was no reservation of pine lands or any other timber lands. That was about the time we were going through the process of reconstruction in those States; and it was thought wise at that time to take the lands from under the operation of the general land laws and put them under the operation of this special law. The first section of this act provides—

That from and after the passage of this act all the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida shall be disposed of according to the stipulations of the homestead law of May 20, 1862, entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," and the act supplemental thereto, approved 21st of March, 1864, but with this restriction, that until the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act no entry shall be made for more than a half quarter-section or eighty acres; and in lieu of the sum of ten dollars required to be paid by the second section of said act, there shall be paid the sum of five dollars at the time of the issue of each patent; and that the public lands in said States shall be disposed of in no other manner after the passage of this act.

Now this bill in effect repeals that clause and places the lands in those States upon the same footing as public lands in all the other States.

Mr. BARBER. How is it in Kansas?

Mr. MOREY. This bill does not affect Kansas.

Mr. BARBER. But the gentleman spoke of putting these lands on the same footing with public lands in all the other States; and I ask him what is the case in Kansas?

Mr. MOREY. In Kansas and Nebraska the pine lands are not subject to homestead entry, but they are subject to sale; and they are subject to entry after being once advertised for sale. The fact is that long before the war large tracts of timber lands in Louisiana had been offered for sale and after being so offered were subject to entry.

Mr. COTTON. Does this bill grant any donation of lands to the States?

Mr. MOREY. No, sir; it does not make any donation.

Mr. COTTON. It merely opens the land for location?

Mr. MOREY. Yes, sir; it merely removes that restrictive special legislation that applied to those States alone.

Mr. COTTON. Have we not recently passed a bill repealing the pre-emption laws?

Mr. MOREY. We have; but it has not passed the Senate. But if this bill be passed we shall be subject to the operations of that bill in just the same way as all the other States; and on the same footing as these States themselves were prior to the legislation it is now proposed to repeal.

Mr. CONGER. The object of the passage of the law of 1871, if I remember aright, was to prevent throwing into the market for purchase the Government lands in those States; to make all those Government lands liable only to homestead and pre-emption entry. The object was especially to keep the public domain there as homesteads for the poor, of whatever race, color, or condition in life; to prevent speculators from buying those lands for any purpose. It was then said in debate on the subject that it was especially desirable for the growth and prosperity of those States, and for the benefit of the poor people living there, that those lands should be reserved from general sale; that they should not be put into the market; that they should be reserved thenceforth, until Congress saw fit to remove the restriction, as public domain for all settlers, to be taken as homesteads. It was said that if that law should remain in force it would encourage in the course of years not only occupation of homesteads by the colored and other poor people of those States, but would afford a strong inducement for immigration from the Old World. Congress in passing that law with that restriction had in view the encouragement of the growth and settlement of those States. Now will the gentleman tell this House whether that object has been so far accomplished that those lands may now be thrown open to purchasers and speculators; whether all who desire homesteads have been enabled to acquire them; whether immigration has been attracted from the Old World for the sake of securing free homesteads; whether those States have already been settled by all of that class who will come; and whether the reservation made with that purpose is no longer necessary? What is the object of thus changing a law which was claimed only two or three years ago to be so beneficial to those States themselves?

This bill now proposes to open those lands for sale to speculators, to whoever will buy them. It goes further. Unless some restrictive clause be introduced in the bill, it throws the Government live-oak forests in Louisiana and Florida open to purchase for speculative purposes. I submit to the House that either we were mistaken in the legislation of three years ago or else the time has not yet come to throw all these lands into the market, especially without reserving to the Government the live-oak lands so necessary for future use in maintaining our Navy.

I do not antagonize this proposition; but I desire for my own information to know exactly why this law should be passed, why gentlemen from the South desire any such different legislation from what they required so short a time ago?

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that although we appreciated the spirit which actuated that legislation at that time, we did not ask for it, and we think now that we know better what is for the interest of our States than the gentlemen who passed those laws. We think that we have passed out of the condition of tutelage, and we ask now that the public lands in our States shall be placed upon the same footing and subjected to the operations of the same law as the public lands in Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, and other States.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] says that the act proposed now to be repealed was passed for the purpose of making these lands subject to the operation of the homestead and pre-emption laws. That is true so far as the homstead law is concerned; but it placed them under the operations of that law alone. They are not subject to pre-emption at all under the provisions of that act. They are subject only to the homestead law, and with a large body of pine lands in our State fit only for milling purposes, I would like to ask how he would apply that homestead law which requires they should cultivate the land? You do not expect them to go into pine lands only fit for milling purposes and cultivate them? Under the provisions of that law we can only get timber for lumber purposes by stealing it off the public lands. There is no way we can pre-empt or buy it. We can only enter it under the provisions of the homestead law by cultivating it.

Mr. CONGER. Let a proper bill be prepared to bring into market these pine or other lands unfit for cultivation or agricultural purposes, and submit that plain and distinct proposition.

Mr. MOREY. Does the gentleman mean to say because these States lie along the Gulf, and because at one time they were in rebellion, they should now be under a different system of law from his own State? We only ask to be placed under the same system which applies to lands in your own State.

Mr. CONGER. I will answer the gentleman. I do say it is more the duty of the Government of the United States and of this House, in being true to the pledges which have been made to the freedmen, to preserve for some years to come in the States where they dwell in such great numbers the right to enter for themselves homesteads free of cost than it is in States where freedmen do not exist.

Mr. MOREY. Does the gentleman propose to force these colored brothers to take homesteads upon the pine lands?

Mr. CONGER. They will not probably go into the pine lands unless they desire to do so.

Mr. MOREY. There are plenty of lands for them besides these pine lands.

Mr. CONGER. The pine lands of the South to-day for homesteads and for the sale of the pine timber in clearing them are worth, as the gentleman knows, ten times prairie lands.

Mr. MOREY. I will state further in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan that we should take care of this portion of our people, that I hold in my hand a petition largely signed, and probably four-fifths by colored men, asking for the passage of this bill. This petition comes from Calcasieu and Cameron Parishes, where a large part of these pine lands is situated. They are engaged in cutting lumber now for milling purposes. Some of them have mills of their own. If, then, the gentleman is solicitous in their behalf, if he will listen to their voice and not undertake to do for them what they do not want done, then he will allow this bill to pass.

Mr. CONGER. I might say to the gentleman from Louisiana, there are lumbermen from my own State of Michigan who are desirous to have it become a law. I could speak for some of my people in advocating the passage of this bill. I know they are waiting in Florida, in Louisiana, and Arkansas, some few of them, an opportunity to take any of these lands. They will be right on hand to take them when the time comes. I could speak for my own citizens and advocate the gentleman's bill, but I do not believe that to be my duty.

Mr. MOREY. I yield now to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HERNDON.]

Mr. HERNDON. I have an amendment to offer to the bill which I think will secure all desired by the mover of the bill. The amendment which I offer and which I will have read is simply to repeal the first section of an act approved June 21, 1866. The bill as reported I think is obnoxious for this reason. The latter part of it reads thus:

That from and after the 1st day of September, 1874, all acts of Congress relating to the sale of public lands, and granting pre-emption rights to actual settlers then in force in the other States and Territories of the United States, shall without further legislation, extend over and be in force in these States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, and Arkansas.

I do not look on your laws which are applicable to each one of the States, for many of them are special in their nature and character, as being applicable to these five States. They differ from each other. Of course all general laws should be applicable, but that I understand is not really the object of this bill. Therefore my amendment is to simplify this bill by repealing the first section of the act which is the one complained of. The first section of the act of June 21, 1866, discriminates against these five States and places them in a different condition from the other States of the Union. One of the reasons for this was to give the colored people residing in those States an opportunity to secure a home each for himself if they should so desire it. Another change from the existing laws was to cut the quantity down to eighty acres instead of one hundred and sixty acres. There was no exemption of pine timber as is complained by the gentleman from Michigan, because that whole country almost is a pine country.

Now what these people want is simply this: that this section which they consider onerous and discriminating in its character against them shall be repealed, and that they shall be placed upon the same footing as the people of all the other States, so that the general laws shall be applicable to them. I do not understand that they ask anything more, nor will they be content with anything less. It is universally the case I believe, with this solitary exception, that under the homestead act and under the pre-emption act each homesteader and pre-emptor can take one hundred and sixty acres of land. Here they are only allowed eighty acres, half the amount. This act provided that they should not pre-empt at all. It restricted them to the acts of 1862 and 1864, to homestead settlement only. They wish the benefit of the pre-emption law, unless that law should be repealed by the substitution of the more general and comprehensive homestead act which has recently passed this House and is now pending in the Senate.

That is what they want. I therefore offer my amendment, which is simply to repeal the first section of the act of 1866. I send it to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlements in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, and Arkansas," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let the Clerk read the section of the act which this proposes to repeal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act all the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida shall be disposed of according to the stipulations of the homestead law of 20th May, 1862, entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," and the act supplemental thereto, approved 21st of March, 1864, but with this restriction, that until the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act no entry shall be made for more than a half-quarter section, or eighty acres; and in lieu of the sum of ten dollars required to be paid by the second section of said act, there shall be paid the sum of five dollars at the time of the issue of each patent; and that the public lands in said States shall be disposed of in no other manner after the passage of this act: Provided, That no distinction or discrimination shall be made in the construction or execution of this act on account of race or color: And provided further, That no mineral lands shall be liable to entry and settlement under its provisions.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If this bill should pass, it would pass because the judgment of the House would be that the original law should not have been passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the House to what I suppose to have been the reasons that led Congress to pass the original law in 1866. A race had just been emancipated. Many of them resided in these States, and none of them were land-holders. They had no real estate. The land other than the Government lands in all that section of country was held by former slaveholders, by men who had an inveterate prejudice from education and from all their surroundings against seeing a negro an owner of land. Evidently it was apparent to Congress that unless the public lands of those States could be held open to homestead entry by persons of that race which had just been emancipated they never could acquire homes in that southern country; that, in other words, the only way in which they could become possessed of real estate would be through a homestead law like this.

Now, I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that that prejudice against the sale of lands to the colored people in the South has yet all ceased. As I understand, they to-day would have difficulty in purchasing homes in that country of the former or present land-owners; and that it is mainly through the provisions of such a law as this, giving them the right of entry and the right to obtain homesteads upon the public lands, that they can become the owners of any real estate.

Now, sir, it seems to me it is possible—I do not say it is probable, but it seems to me it is possible—that the passage of such a law as this might prevent or might postpone much longer than we should desire to see it postponed the acquisition of homes or real estate by these colored people. They have not yet become rich. They are not yet in a condition, I suppose, many of them, to purchase lands. But they could make the payment of the entry-fee required here of five dollars for eighty acres. They could do that, and they could begin in this way to get homes.

If it be necessary, as was suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] that some of these timber lands should be put into the market, it is possible that a bill limiting the operation of this law to such lands, or in some such way, would be beneficial. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that those who passed this law originally were all wrong. It may be that they did not estimate properly the supposed prejudice that existed against these colored people getting homes in that country. But as the law reads it seems to me to have been intended for the very purpose of making it possible that these colored people might secure homes. That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. CALDWELL. I hope the gentleman will allow me to correct him in an error into which I think he has fallen.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I shall, of course, be very glad to be corrected if I have fallen into any error.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman has declared that there is a difficulty in the Southern States in the way of the negro's securing land by purchase. Now, I am satisfied that if the gentleman lived in the State of Alabama, or would even visit the State of Alabama and inquire of those who by their thrift have been able either to enter lands or to purchase them, they will answer him promptly that they met with no difficulty whatever. I venture to say that he would find upon examination that there is no disinclination on the part of the people of the Southern States to sell land to any one, whether black or white, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The only condition, I will say to the gentleman, is that the purchasers shall have money to pay for the lands. If they have money they can always purchase them.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not desire to enter into any controversy with the gentleman as to that. I said that I understood that the principal reason for the original passage of this law was that it was supposed to be a necessity in order to enable the colored people of the South to acquire homes. I said I thought it possible that race-prejudice had not so far died out in the South that it was possible to-day this law might not be beneficial in securing the object for which it was originally passed.

Let me add one word more, for I do not care to prolong this discussion, and it is that the land now open to homestead settlement is, as we all know, mostly a long distance away from the place where these colored people have been accustomed to live. We know their attachment to their own localities. They are not the pioneers who go out beyond the Mississippi and beyond the Missouri for the purpose of building up that great western country. They stay around the homes of their childhood, and if they are to have any benefit under the homestead laws it must be under a homestead law which secures to them public lands, homes within sight almost of the places of their nativity. There is a double reason; there is a hundred-fold argument in favor of maintaining such a law as this, by which these colored people may secure homes in the very places where they have earned them by long lives of toil; that they may secure them cheaply, and may there live and work, rearing families and laying the foundation for the prosperity of their children and of the generations which shall come after them, a prosperity which I believe they deserve and which they will yet attain.

Mr. CALDWELL. I trust the gentleman will indulge me in stating one fact in answer to what he has said. The colored men of the South, those who have acquired homes—and I speak chiefly with reference to those within my own section, and particularly those in my own county—have acquired those homes from those whom they have heretofore served, and that by purchase, and there is no unwillingness upon the part of the former masters to aid, to encourage, and to give countenance to those who have been their slaves. I assure the gentleman from Vermont that nowhere in these States do we find the former masters unwilling to do justice to or unwilling to aid their former slaves, in selling them land and giving them an opportunity to have homes which they may call their own.

Mr. SHANKS. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to one fact. The gentleman has stated that all that is required is that they shall have money to pay for the lands they purchase. By this law they can acquire lands without a cent of money.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let me add that I know divers instances, some of them in my own county, where former masters have sold land to their slaves and have given them time in which to pay for it, and years have passed by and the lands are still unpaid for, and yet the former slaves are working and laboring on those lands and making an effort to pay for them; and they are not oppressed. The former masters encourage them and give them time to pay for those lands.

I mention these facts to disabuse the minds of those who have heretofore entertained the idea that the colored men cannot secure homes by purchase in the South. If the gentleman from Vermont has been laboring under that impression, I beg him to visit us to see and inquire of these very persons who have been slaves whether or not their former masters are doing them injustice, or denying them the right to secure lands by purchase or otherwise.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I did not know that the gentleman from Louisiana was entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not sure that I fully comprehend the question before the House, but if I do, it is one that need have no relation whatever to the former condition of master and slave. I do not see any real necessity for referring to that relation or to any supposed prejudice that may exist between the former masters and the former slaves.

I am disposed, from what little I know by observation in the South since the war, to believe what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] has said, that to a very great extent the former masters are quite kindly disposed toward their former slaves, and quite willing to see them obtain homes and become prosperous. But the question before us is outside of that, and not to be considered with reference to whites or blacks. I suppose the Government owns certain lands in these States. We started to apply to these lands the general doctrine that we hold in regard to our public lands. Uncle Sam is no longer in the field peddling out his land, but he holds it in trust for actual settlers. That is our policy to-day in regard to all our twelve hundred million acres of land, with the exception perhaps of timber-lands and mineral lands. Our general policy is that our lands are held in trust for actual settlers.

We have adopted that policy and undertaken to apply it under the act in question to the lands in these Southern States. Now, will any man tell us why we should depart from that policy. These lands are surrounded by poor people who need land. They cannot go to Kansas, Dakota, or Montana and settle on the public lands there under the homestead law. But there is land owned by the Government right by them upon which they can settle, and by paying the usual homestead fees acquire a title in them. I cannot for my life see any reason for departing in this one section alone from our general policy, and I object most strenuously to any bill which proposes that we shall depart from it.

Mr. RICE. I am afraid I find that we are drifting off again to-night into flights of fancy, without confining ourselves to the consideration of the subject-matter now before the House.

A law was passed in 1866 by the Congress of the United States reserving all the public lands in the States mentioned therein for the supposed use of a large number of colored persons who were beginning a new life about that time. It was a most humane and wise precaution. Eight years have elapsed, and those lands have not yet been taken up. Those States having been restored to an equal footing with the other States of the Union, they now ask that they shall be dealt with as all of the rest of the States have been dealt with in regard to the public lands. That is the whole story. I do not know that there is to be said anything about it beyond that. They want to be treated as are the other States of the Union. You have held this land for eight years for whoever chose to enter upon it. They now ask that the United States shall take it back and advertise it for sale, timber land and other lands, the same as they do the timber and other lands in the other States.

I believe that is the whole story, and we can vote upon it without indulging in any hour speeches about it.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] for five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the House will not repeal the act of 1866. I think that instead of repealing it the House is committed to the principle of applying the same policy to all the public lands everywhere. As far back as 1868, when this subject became one of vast interest, because the people of this country began then to discover that this great heritage of ours was rapidly passing beyond their reach, rapidly coming under the control of speculators, this House with great unanimity adopted a resolution declaring that all the public lands should be held for purposes of actual settlement only, the title to pass to actual settlers only; and that the lands should be withheld for no other purpose whatever, except in the case of special grants for purposes of education. I have yet to hear an expression of sentiment from a citizen of this country anywhere, or through the public press anywhere, against that policy of this House. On the contrary, the approval has been universal.

But a few weeks since the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] and the successor of the distinguished gentleman who reported the act of 1866 from the same committee, reported a bill to this House, which he assured us would have the effect of withdrawing all public lands from speculation, and securing them for the fulfillment of that sacred trust time and again declared by both of the great political parties of the country in their conventions, and time and again declared in this House, that is for the purpose of securing homesteads to actual settlers. We were assured that the effect of the bill would be to accomplish that purpose, and I believe it will accomplish it.

Your great Territory of Dakota—and I want my friend from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] to bear in mind that this act of 1866 is not a discrimination against his section—take the Territory of Dakota, embracing, as I believe it does in some respects, the garden spot of this country, that region along the Red River of the North; you thought proper at the instance of the Delegate from that Territory to withdraw those lands from the grasp and cupidity of speculators, and to secure them to actual settlers.

The tendency in that direction has been steady and unyielding, at least for the last six years. You are now asked, for the first time in six years, since this benign policy has been inaugurated by the Government to retrace your steps and bring the vast body of land in these States within the reach of speculators alone. There never has been an hour in our history, had it not been for the apparently inexhaustible quantity of land in the West, when the men who controlled the destinies of this country would not have seen that the policy of allowing lands to be the subject of speculation, was as inhumane and as contrary to the genius of our Government as it would be to allow speculation in God's blessed sunlight and the free air of heaven. I trust there will be no step backward on this subject and that these States will not be exempted from the operation of the act of 1866. If the bill already passed by the House should fail to become a law or should not be found to accomplish the object of securing these lands to actual settlers under the homestead law, I hope we shall still seek by legislation to carry out the policy that not one single acre of the public lands shall be held subject to sale for speculative purposes. A distinguished citizen of Indiana, Hon. George W. Julian, formerly one of my colleagues, had the honor of bringing before this House the act of 1866. That gentleman was apprehensive, I believe, that the bill reported by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] might have the effect to destroy the benefits of that humane law; but I believe he afterward accepted the assurance that the tendency of the legislation inaugurated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was to carry forward the American idea—the idea consonant with the principles of free government—that land is not the subject of speculation or monopoly but should be devoted to securing homes for settlers only, and for no other purpose unless it be the advancement of the cause of education.

Mr. HERNDON. Has the bill any other object than to secure these lands for homesteads?

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot answer that question directly, because I do not know but that the bill of my friend from Pennsylvania may fail in the Senate. We all know that there are lands now open to speculation in different sections of this Union; and I do not want to open any more lands for that purpose. If I believed that we would not extend that legislation to all the States of the Union, I should feel that we were committing a fatal mistake in our legislation.

Mr. HERNDON. Suppose that the House bill now pending in the Senate should not pass there and become a law, still does this bill open a single acre of land to public sale?

Mr. HOLMAN. It would at this time.

Mr. HERNDON. Under what law?

Mr. HOLMAN. It would open all those lands to pre-emption—the very worst form of speculation that we have ever known. The bill of my friend from Pennsylvania proposes to abolish the pre-emption law.

Mr. MOREY. I am sorry that some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill have been led away into a general discussion of the land policy of the Government. This bill makes but two provisions. In the first place, it repeals that enactment which set apart all the lands of those States for homestead entry in tracts of eighty acres. It allows our homestead settlers to enter upon these lands as they do in other States, and take up one hundred and sixty acres. It also places the land in those States under the operation of the pre-emption laws—laws that are in force in every other State in the Union. If that excellent bill to which my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has referred, and which has already passed this House, should be passed by the Senate and become a law, it will operate over these lands just as it will over the other lands of the country. But that bill although it has passed this House is not a law; it may never become a law. Until it does pass, we merely ask that the lands in our States shall be placed under the operation of the same laws that operate in other States. That is all there is in the bill. I now move the previous question.

Mr. FORT. I desire to submit two amendments to the bill, to which I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] will not object. I trust that he will at any rate allow them to be read.

Mr. MOREY. I yield that they may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to the proviso of the last section the following:

Provided, That all lands bearing live-oak timber and heretofore reserved from sale shall not be deemed to be subject to sale under this act: And provided further, That none of the lands hereby made subject to private entry shall be sold at less than $1.25 per acre.

Mr. FORT. As I understand, if these lands are now opened to sale in the States named, they will come under the operation of laws that may open a large quantity of them to entry at twelve and a half cents per acre.

Mr. MOREY. That law has been repealed a long time ago. I have no objection to either of the amendments. Both provisions, as I understand, are the law already.

Mr. HOLMAN. Both are a part of the law of the land, and law that ought to be repealed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MOREY. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The object of this bill is simply to put the people of the South in exactly the same position that the people of the North hold to-day; and if the bill which is now pending in the Senate should pass, then the people North and South will stand in exactly the same position. That is the whole question involved.

Mr. MOREY. I now call the previous question.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman allow my amendments to come in?

Mr. MOREY. I accept them.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] must know that they are the law now.

There being no objection, the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the previous question will be regarded as seconded and the main question ordered.

There was no objection.

The question being taken on the substitute offered by Mr. HERNDON, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the previous question has not been seconded. I move to recommit the bill.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. MOREY. I raise the point of order that the previous question was seconded by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair heard no objection to seconding the previous question and ordering the main question; it was done without any apparent opposition.

The question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time,

Mr. HOLMAN called for a division.

Mr. MOREY. I will not insist on the count, but will move to recommit the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. With that understanding the motion will be agreed to, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

KANSAS INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3528) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale.

The preamble and bill were read.

The preamble recites that the Secretary of the Interior, in pursuance of an act approved May 8, 1872, caused to be appraised the lands heretofore owned by the Kansas tribe of Indians, in the State of Kansas, which by the terms of the treaty made by the United States and said Indians, and proclaimed November 17, 1860, were to be sold for the benefit of said Indians; which appraisement also includes all improvements on the same, and the value of said improvements, distinguishing between improvements made by members of said Indian tribe, the United States, and white settlers; and the appraisement thus made was so high that neither settlers nor purchasers were able to pay the same, and the said land has remained unsold from the passage of the act.

The first section of the bill then provides that each bona fide settler on any of the trust lands embraced in said act, heretofore reported as such by the commissioners appointed to make said appraisement, and the rejected claimants as bona fide settlers, who were recommended as such by Andrew C. Williams, acting under instructions to Superintendent Hoag, from the Indian office, dated October 24, 1872, be permitted to make payment of the appraised value of their lands to the local land office at Topeka, Kansas, under such rules as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may adopt, in six equal annual installments; the first installment payable on the 1st day of January, 1875, or within six months after the date of the approval of a new appraisement, when made, and the remaining installments payable annually from that time, and drawing interest at 6 per cent. per annum until paid; provided, that where there is timber on any of the lands to be sold under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Interior shall require the purchaser to enter into bond, with approved security, that he shall commit no waste on the timber, or otherwise, on said land until the last payment is made, and give his notes to secure the purchase money thereof on the terms aforesaid.

The second section provides that all the remainder of the trust lands and of the undisposed portion of the diminished reserves shall be subject to entry at the local land office at Topeka, Kansas, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, unless a legal subdivision of a section shall be fractional and found to contain a greater number of acres, by actual settlers, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe. And the parties making such entries shall be required to make payment of the appraised value of the land entered and occupied by each in the following manner: One-fourth at the time that the entry is made, and the remainder in three equal annual payments, drawing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, which payments shall be secured by notes payable to the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior shall withhold title until the last payment is made; and the Secretary of the Interior, where there is timber on the lands, shall, in addition, compel the purchaser to enter into bond, with approved security, to commit no waste, by the destruction of timber or otherwise, on the premises until final payment has been made; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents in fee-simple to be issued to all parties who shall complete purchases under the provisions of this act; provided, that if any person or persons applying to purchase land under the provisions of this act shall fail to made payment, or to perform any other conditions required by the provisions of this act, or by rules and regulations that may be prescribed in the execution hereof, within ninety days after such payment shall become due or performance be required by the terms hereof, or by the rules and regulations which may be prescribed in the execution hereof, such person or persons shall forfeit all rights under the provisions of this act, and all claim or right to reimbursement or compensation for previous action or payment by said person or persons under the provisions hereof; and the land proposed to be purchased by such person or persons shall again be subject to sale as though no action had been had in regard to the same; and provided that all the lands not taken within twelve months after the passage of this act may be sold in amounts not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres to any one person, at the appraised price, in the land district in which they are situated.

The third section provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall inquire into the correctness of the appraisement of these lands; and if he be satisfied that they have been appraised at more than their present cash value, he may appoint a new commission of three persons to reappraise the same; the per diem and expenses of which, at the rates heretofore paid to such commissioners, shall be deducted from the proceeds of said lands; and in case he shall deem it more economical or advisable, he may, instead of ordering a new appraisement, reduce the old appraisement of said lands to said purchasers, not exceeding 25 per cent. of such appraisement.

The fourth section provides that in all cases where there has been an appraisement of Indian improvements on any of said lands, the settler or purchaser may submit evidence at the land office when the purchase is made, showing what the actual cash value of such improvements was when the settler first occupied the land; and on such evidence the Secretary of the Interior may reduce such appraisement to an amount that would be fair and just, not exceeding 25 per cent. of such appraisement.

The fifth section provides that in preparing or giving their testimony, all settlers or purchasers of land under the provisions of this act may have such testimony taken, after due and legal notice to the opposing party in interest, before any notary public or person qualified to administer an oath, and may forward such testimony with their application to the land offices or parties authorized to dispose of said lands, which testimony shall be received as if taken before the officers of such land office.

The sixth section provides that the net proceeds arising from such sales, after defraying the expenses of appraisement and sale, which have heretofore or may hereafter be incurred, and also the outstanding indebtedness, principal and interest, of said Kansas tribe of Indians, which has heretofore been incurred under treaty stipulations, shall belong to said tribe in common, and may be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under direction of the President of the United States, in providing and improving for them new homes in the Indian Territory, and in subsisting them until they become self-sustaining; and the residue, not so required, shall be placed to their credit on the books of the Treasury, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and be held as a fund for their civilization, the interest of which and the principal, when deemed necessary by the President of the United States, may be used for such purpose.

Mr. MERRIAM. I wish to make the point of order that the bill proposes to dispose of the public lands, but will reserve it until some explanation is made by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I wish in a few words to explain the character of this bill as reported from the Committee on the Public Lands. It has been considered carefully for one or two months. These lands were provided to be sold some time ago, and a bill was introduced into Congress to sell them for $1.25 per acre. That bill passed one House but failed to pass the other.

Under the direction of the Interior Department these Kansas Indians have been removed to the Indian Territory where they now live. They have not paid the Government for the lands they now occupy, but appropriations have been made from time to time to supply their necessary wants, and those sums are to be reimbursed out of the proceeds of the sale of these lands.

The Interior Department transmitted to the committee this proposition for the sale of these lands. The lands have been appraised under a former law, but were not sold. The only modifications made in the draught sent from the Interior Department and from the Indian Office were these: The first section provides that the few settlers who went upon the lands in the first place shall have an extension of the time which is provided for the payment of the price of those lands. The Commissioner provided it should be in four equal annual payments; but as these lands have been appraised at a high price, and these settlers would have to pay from six to eleven hundred dollars each, it was deemed proper to grant this extension in order to enable them to make their payments. This was believed to be the shortest period within which the settlers should be required to make settlement. Some of them have expended from one to two thousand dollars in improvements. All other settlers except those which I have just indicated the Commissioner suggested should pay one-quarter down and the other in three equal annual payments. This will bear 6 per cent. interest per annum.

It is to the interest of the Government these lands should be sold, in order that it may be reimbursed for the money which it has already expended. In the deficiency appropriation bill passed the other day there is an appropriation for these very Indians.

The Government has expended a large amount of money on these Indians, and the proceeds of the sales of these lands will only reimburse the Government, and very little will go to the Indians themselves.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I hope my colleague will explain exactly that there is no portion which is to come out of the Treasury of the United States, and that therefore it is not amenable to the point of order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. No point of order can lie against the bill, for instead of taking money out of the Treasury it proposes to reimburse the Government for money already expended. These lands are to be sold under an appraisement, and the proceeds of the sale will revert to the Government. There is no possible appropriation involved from the Treasury. The appropriation has already been made. These lands belong to the Kansas Indians.

A MEMBER. Has not the Government paid for them?

Mr. PHILLIPS. If the Government had paid for these lands and they belonged to the Government now, then they would be open to pre-emption at one dollar and a quarter per acre. If they belonged to the Government of the United States they would have been open for pre-emption and homestead purposes. The Government did not buy these lands. The bill therefore is not open to the point of order, because this is not the property of the United States but the property of the Kansas Indians.

These lands have been appraised at a very high price. You can purchase railroad lands, and I have bought them myself within a year, for $2.50 per acre.

These lands were appraised by a Quaker commission at a price so high that no one could buy them. The bill gives the Commissioner the right to sell them, but there is also a provision by which if he thinks it is more economical he may reduce the price 25 per cent. He is not obliged to do so.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask the gentleman from Kansas whether he will not consent to strike out the third, fourth, and fifth sections of his bill providing for reappraisment? The other sections provide this land may be sold on credit. The third, fourth, and fifth sections authorize the Secretary of the Interior to inquire into the correctness of the appraisment already made, and if he is satisfied on that inquiry it is too high, it then authorizes him to order a new appraisement. I inquire of the gentleman if he has any objection to that being stricken out?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Let me first explain. I presume the gentleman will desire and the House will desire that these lands should be disposed of as they should have been disposed of some years ago. This merely says:

> That the Secretary of the Interior shall inquire into the correctness of the appraisement of these lands; and if he be satisfied that they have been appraised at more than their present cash value, he may appoint a new commission of three persons to reappraise the same.

This is put in merely to secure the sale of the lands. The Secretary may sell them at the present appraisement, he may make a new appraisement, or he may sell them at 25 per cent. below the present appraisement. This is to save expense. It gives the Secretary of the Interior entire discretion in the matter.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. But the inquiry to be made by the Secretary is this:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall inquire into the correctness of the appraisement of these lands; and if he be satisfied that they have been appraised at more than their present cash value, he may appoint a new commission of three persons to reappraise the same.

It is only if he finds on examination that the lands have been appraised at more than their cash value that he is to order a new appraisement. If he finds that they have been appraised at less, he is not to appoint a new appraisement.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I am willing, in order to meet the gentleman's view, to insert the words "if he finds they have been appraised incorrectly."

Mr. MERRIAM. It appears to me that there is a machinery provided here to eat up the value of the lands. You are selling the land upon credit, taking the notes and collecting the interest, and it seems to me entirely unnecessary to burden the property in this way. And then you say in your bill that wherever there is timber on any of the lands, the purchasers shall enter into bond not to cut the timber until the last payment is made. No man ever owned land in the West under the condition of having the timber kept from him.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] not know that it is to the disadvantage of the Indians who own this land that the sale should be deferred from year to year, because settlers go in, and the result is that their lands are taken away from them by trespassers. If the land is to be sold, ought it not to be sold now that it has been appraised?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The fact is that one-twentieth part of the land has no timber on it at all. This merely makes the purchasers give bonds that they will commit no waste on the timber until the last payment is made.

Mr. COTTON. Has this bill the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. PHILLIPS. It has.

Mr. COTTON. And of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. PHILLIPS. It has. There is a letter here from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of the draught of a bill submitted to the honorable Secretary of the Interior by this office, under date of November 26, 1873, providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of sale, and to which you propose certain additions and changes.

In returning the same, I have respectfully to say, that inasmuch as the changes and additions suggested by you do not materially affect the general provisions of the bill recommended by this office under date above referred to, I shall urge no objection thereto.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. W. A. PHILLIPS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SHANKS. I have some objections to this bill. According to its provisions these lands are to be appraised at a cash value, and after they are appraised at a cash value, then you commence running a credit of six years against the Indians. Now, sir, if these lands are to be sold on credit, I want that the Indians shall have the benefit of that credit. When lands are to be sold upon credit it is like other property sold upon credit, which brings a larger price. But when you fix the cash price and then give credit for that, you do an injustice to the owner of the property.

But, Mr. Speaker, these lands were appraised and have been largely settled upon. They have been settled upon by persons who knew they were appraised; and now they want to reappraise them. This bill has in its third section a very singular provision which is not in the interest of the Indian at all. The third section says:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall inquire into the correctness of the appraisement of these lands; and if he be satisfied that they have been appraised at more than their present cash value, he may appoint a new commission of three persons to reappraise the same.

But unless he be satisfied that they have been appraised at more than their cash value, there is no charge to be made. Why is that discrimination made against the Indians?

Mr. PHILLIPS. There was no intention to make any such discrimination. I have agreed to amend the bill in that respect.

Mr. SHANKS. There may have been no intention to discriminate against the Indians, but this would work a great injury to the Indians. I am opposed to taking a man's property, appraising it at a cash value, and then converting that cash value into a credit of six years.

But it is said that this is not property of the United States, but property of the Indians. I wish to know on what authority you can come in and take another man's property and appraise it at a low rate against him?

Mr. FORT. The Indians are satisfied that the lands shall be sold on credit.

Mr. SHANKS. These notes are to run for six years' time after giving bonds to secure the timber, and all the expense to be incurred in this way is to be taken out of the Indian fund, and we are told that after all these expenses have been taken out of the Indian fund the balance is to go to civilize the Indians. I want to know whether after you have taken their property and used it in this way, and put all this expense upon them, in what condition they will be to accept civilization at your hands? What will the Indian understand to be the civilization of a set of men who take his property and use it in this way, keeping it from him for six long years?

Mr. FORT. Is not the gentleman willing that the Indians shall pay their debts?

Mr. SHANKS If these Indians are in debt, where will they get the money to pay their debts if you withhold this money from them for six long years? If they are in debt, you prolong the time within which that debt can be paid by this very act you are passing, the effect of which is to deprive the Indians of their property.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all I desire to say further is that I do not want to see this bill pass. The gentleman from Kansas has told you that the committee have deliberated long and seriously upon this measure. Sir, it is a measure which really wrongs the people who own this property. It is a wrong measure, one absolutely wrong, and if the Committee on the Public Lands do not understand Indian matters better than this, I hope they will not attempt to bring any bill in relation to Indian affairs before the House again.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I now yield five minutes to my colleague from Kansas, [Mr. LOWE.]

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words only upon this bill. If I thought the bill would work any injury either to the Indians or to the Government, I should be very far from giving it my indorsement. The recent facts in reference to this reservation and these lands are these: This tract of land was set apart by a treaty with the Kansas Indians and reserved for that purpose. In the year 1872 a bill passed Congress authorizing the removal of the Indians to the Indian Territory and providing for the sale of these lands. The Indians have substantially been removed. It was provided by the act of 1872 that the lands should be appraised at their actual value by a board appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. Such a board was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and an appraisement of the lands was made and they were offered for sale at that appraisement, offered for sale to the highest bidder on sealed proposals, except as to a small portion of the lands which were in the occupation of settlers. That occupation by the settlers was with the consent of the Indians who were then upon the lands. It was an occupation of a portion of the lands not desired for use by the Indians. There was entire amity and harmony between the Indians and the settlers. The larger portion of these lands were not then and are not now at all occupied by settlers. But the appraisement of these lands was at so high a figure that the settlers could not afford to purchase them at that price, and when the lands were offered at public sale on sealed bids they were appraised so high that very few bids for a few tracts only amounted to the appraisement. The fact is the appraisement was so high that nobody will buy the lands for cash at the appraisement.

This measure comes into the House by a report made by the Secretary of the Interior, which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Instead of asking that there shall be a reappraisement of these lands, so as to have them appraised at a low figure, this bill proposes to give the purchasers the opportunity to take the lands at the present appraisement on time. It does not, as the gentleman from Indiana seemed to imply, postpone the payment of the whole purchase-money for six years, but it provides only as to that portion of the lands already occupied, that payment shall be in six installments, one to be paid very soon, and the remaining annually for five years. It is not postponing the payment for a long period, but only dividing the payment, so that a portion shall be paid now, and the remainder by installments hereafter.

Now, sir, so far as the provision in the bill giving permission to the Secretary to reduce the price 25 per cent. is concerned, I do not consider it an important feature of the bill. The Secretary of the Interior will not do anything to the prejudice of the Indians in that regard, and unless he thinks that equity and justice require a reappraisement, he will not permit it, but will have the lands sold at the present appraisement, and the purchase-money paid in installments. I call attention to the fact that while the lands already occupied are to be paid for in six years, the balance of the lands are to be paid for in three years. It seems to me that the bill is in the interest both of the settlers, the Indians, and the Government. At the present appraisement the lands cannot be sold. If you do not pass this or some similar bill, they will have to be reappraised at great expense and put into market, for they will not sell at the present appraisement. They have been for sale ever since 1872, when times were better than they are now, but they were appraised so high that nobody would purchase them, and it is for the interest of all parties concerned that this bill should pass.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I see that the last section of this bill places all this fund in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and authorizes him to dispose of it at his own discretion, as he sees fit. That to me is a very surprising provision. If these lands are sold, the proceeds should be placed in the Treasury of the United States, and appropriated by Congress as all other proceeds of the sale of lands are appropriated.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. These are Indian lands.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Then give the proceeds to the Indians. This section provides that the Secretary of the Interior may at his own discretion appropriate this fund as he sees fit.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Allow me to explain a moment, and I will correct the error into which the gentleman seems to have fallen. These Indians are now in the Indian Territory on lands not yet paid for. The gentleman himself the other day had charge of a bill which appropriated $50,000 for the erection of buildings for these Indians. This fund, derived from the proceeds of this land, is to be for the benefit of the Indians. The section to which the gentleman refers was prepared by the Interior Department, and has not been changed by the committee.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The section to which I refer reads as follows:

That the net proceeds arising from such sales, after defraying the expenses of appraisement and sale, which have heretofore or may hereafter be incurred, and also the outstanding indebtedness, principal and interest, of said Kansas tribe of Indians, which has heretofore been incurred under treaty stipulations, shall belong to said tribe in common, and may be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under direction of the President of the United States, in providing and improving for them new homes in the Indian Territory, and in subsisting them until they become self-sustaining; and the residue, not so required, shall be placed to their credit on the books of the Treasury, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and be held as a fund for their civilization, the interest of which and the principal, when deemed necessary by the President of the United States, may be used for such purpose.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have no objection to striking out of that section the words "and may be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under direction of the President of the United States, in providing and improving for them new homes in the Indian Territory, and in subsisting them until they become self-sustaining."

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That is right. I move that amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Now, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] presses his objection, I have no objection to striking out sections 3 and 4 in relation to the reappraisement of this land.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask that the point of order be ruled upon.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The point of order was raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] who I understand now withdraws it.

Mr. MERRIAM. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If it will obviate the objection of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] I will be willing to strike out the sections in regard to reappraisement. I think they were put in, however, to facilitate this matter.

Mr. SHANKS. If the gentleman will withdraw the bill it will obviate all objections.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I cannot withdraw the bill. I have met the only objection which the gentleman has urged to the bill.

Mr. SHANKS. If the gentleman will withdraw the bill I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. SHANKS. I insist upon the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] and object to his withdrawing it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] has the right to renew the point of order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask the gentleman to state his point of order.

Mr. SHANKS. It is that this bill proposes to make a disposition of the public lands.

Mr. PHILLIPS. They are not public lands.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Is that a point of order? Public lands of what?

Mr. SHANKS. What is the gentleman arguing?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard upon his point of order?

Mr. SHANKS. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the point of order well taken. These lands are Indian lands, held in trust by the Government for the benefit of these Indians. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for five minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I agree with my friend from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] that we should not do any injustice to the Indians, and I do not think this bill will do any. But while we are careful about the Indians we should have some regard for the interests of our own citizens. This bill takes better care of the interest of these Indians than we have done by our legislation in regard to the lands that belong to the United States. For a great many years past we have determined by our legislation that it is our policy to dispose of our public lands largely for homesteads without any compensation at all, and even where the Government undertakes to exact compensation from settlers, the price has been established at a dollar and a quarter an acre, except in reference to the alternate reserved sections along the line of land-grant railroads, where the maximum price has been fixed at two dollars and a half an acre.

Now I do not believe that we should take better care of the interests of these Indians than we do of the interests of the people of the United States. If it is our policy to sell the public lands at $2.50 an acre in the vicinity of land-grant railroads, and $1.25 an acre outside of the railroad grants, then it should be our policy to sell these lands at the same price. While I would do no injustice and no wrong to any Indian in this broad land, certainly not to these Indians in Kansas, yet I would do no injustice to the settlers who are upon this land.

Mr. SHANKS. By what authority do we determine that we ought to sell lands that do not belong to us, but to others, at a given price?

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is just the point I am coming to. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] ought to have learned by this time, having been in Congress a great many years, that these Indians have no title to a foot of land on this continent.

Mr. SHANKS. That is what I wanted to get the gentleman to say. He said the other day that he was in opposition to the treaties made by this Government. I want him to stand before this House as saying what he said the other day, that he was opposed to carrying out our treaty stipulations with these people.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will stand before this House now and say that I am opposed to all Indians treaties which have undertaken to dispose of the public lands. I am opposed to them because they have been "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity;" because they have been a fruitful source of corruption and fraud from beginning to end; because they have been unauthorized by the Constitution of the United States and a violation of that provision which declares that Congress shall have power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Mr. SHANKS. I have a copy of an argument in which the gentleman defends those treaties, an argument against the railroads and in favor of the settlers upon the ground of the validity of those treaties which he condemns now.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman is mistaken. I have never in my life said that any treaty which undertook to dispose of the public lands of the United States had any validity; for I do not so believe, and no court has so decided. No judge who understands anything of the principles of the Constitution will ever so decide.

As I have said I am willing to protect the interest of these Indians; but I am unwilling to take better care of them than I would of the people of the United States in regard to the lands which they own; and they own these lands. It is the policy of the Government to induce settlers to go upon the public lands and establish homes. It is in the interest of civilization that this should be done. Whatever money may arise from the sale of these lands and may go to these Indians will be so much contributed to them as a mere gratuity; and in my judgment we are squandering entirely too much money upon the Indians. It is high time we should treat them as the government in Canada treats the Indians there—make them self-supporting. Let the Indians work; let them be taught that man should eat bread in the sweat of his brow, and that he who will not earn his bread, if he is able to do so, ought to starve.

I speak in behalf of the settlers on these lands; in behalf of a proper policy on the part of the Government in reference to the lands; in behalf of what is the common interest of the whole country without any injustice to these Indians.

Mr. SHANKS. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] argues that these lands belong to the United States, I renew my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order has already been ruled upon by the Chair, and it has been overruled.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I propose to move the previous question, but will first yield to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] who wishes to move an amendment.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out the third and fourth sections providing for reappraisement. I make this motion as a friend of the bill, which will thus be made satisfactory to some who now oppose it. The gentleman who reports the bill assents to these amendments.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I have no objection to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. PHILLIPS called the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SHANKS. I demand a vote by division on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Then I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me that I may make a report from the Committee on Appropriations to be printed.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not object to that.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have no objection of course to this report being presented and printed; but I understood that no business whatever was to be done this evening, except the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SENER and Mr. FORT called for the regular order.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. Speaker, has the previous question been ordered upon the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. COTTON. Then of course the bill will go over as unfinished business.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. With the understanding that we are not to spend time on anything that cannot go through, I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SENER. I renew the motion.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 16, noes 38.

Mr. SENER. I give notice I shall oppose any legislation unless there is a quorum.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHANKS demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 25.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten minutes to ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to report back several bills from the Committee on Claims that they may be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called, the House will proceed to consider the report of the Committee on Appropriations on the Senate amendments to the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. LOWE. I rise to a question of order. When the House adjourned last night there was a bill under consideration. Does not that bill come over as unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. To what bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. LOWE. The bill in relation to the sale of Indian lands in Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The House meets at eleven o'clock, and if the gentleman had been in his seat he would have known that that bill was passed some time since.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am willing to withdraw the call for the regular order long enough to allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] to make his report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is on the floor on the deficiency bill and will proceed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Appropriations on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes.

The recommendations of the committee in regard to the Senate amendments were agreed to, except where objection was made.

Senate amendment numbered "five," to the paragraph under the heading "Treasury miscellaneous," was read as follows:

In line 271, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$30,000;" so that it will read: For furniture and repairs of same, carpets, and similar necessaries for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, $30,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This amendment restores the appropriation as originally reported by the Committee on Appropriations in the deficiency bill to the House. The committee reported $30,000 as a deficiency for furniture, repairs, carpets, and similar necessaries for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department. The House after discussion by a vote reduced the amount to $10,000. The Senate have put it back to $30,000, and the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is nearly the middle of June. I suppose the officers of the Department have not used this money already, for they have no authority for using it. If they have used it, it has been in violation of law. If this bill passes, the appropriation cannot take effect before the middle of June at least, because this will have to go before a conference committee; the report of the conference committee will have to be agreed to in both Houses, and then the bill will have to be engrossed and signed. There will be $30,000 to be expended in the last ten days of this month, before the close of this fiscal year. It does seem to me that the committee ought to give the House some substantial reason for appropriating such an amount in a deficiency bill under those circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. The matter was fully discussed in the House, and the reasons for the appropriation were given quite at length. It must not be assumed that this money has not been expended. It was explained in the previous discussion that accidents would occur to furniture in public buildings in all parts of the United States, and in the judgment of the committee, and it appears the Senate is of the same judgment, this appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this money has already been expended?

Mr. GARFIELD. Most of it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How does it come to have been expended without an appropriation, when such an expenditure is made unlawful?

Mr. GARFIELD. In this class of cases the law to which the gentleman refers is not carried out. It does not apply to cases of this kind, which must necessarily arise in carrying on the ordinary work of the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. That is an extraordinary admission on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He tells us that this money has not been expended.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not say so. I say that most of the money has been expended, and that the Secretary of the Treasury finds this expenditure necessary in order to maintain the furniture of the public buildings of the country.

Mr. RANDALL. Has any contract been made whereby this indebtedness has been assured on the part of the Government for the expenditure of $30,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman understands that the repair of furniture is not necessarily a matter of contract.

Mr. RANDALL. But this is a deficiency.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know it is a deficiency.

Mr. RANDALL. And it is supposed to be expended during the current year.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman mean to say that all deficiencies are in violation of law? That is certainly a new doctrine, never before advanced anywhere that I know of. I understand that there are special appropriations definitely given to carry on work up to a certain point which are limited by the appropriation, and in such a case it is a violation of law to expend more.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have the law right here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman please show me any point in the bill or in any deficiency bill that is not open to the same objection?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not know that there is any other point in the bill open to the objection; but I do know that this point is.

Mr. GARFIELD. How does the gentleman know it?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The law is that no officer of any Department shall expend money in excess of appropriations made by Congress. Now, in this case there has been no appropriation made for this expenditure, and if any expenditure has been made it has been made in violation of law, and the officer of the Government who made it ought to be removed.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I can explain to the House where a large portion of this $30,000 has been expended and how it becomes a deficiency for this year. There has been since last year an extension of the free-delivery system in various cities. I know the effect of that extension so far as the cities of Petersburgh and Norfolk are concerned, which have come under my observation. The free-delivery system has been established there and it has been found absolutely necessary that the needed furniture and appliances in the post-offices should be put there. Now, the Treasury Department has charge of all this sort of furnishing of public buildings. The Post-Office Department has nothing to do with it; all the furniture in all the post-offices of the United States is under the control of the Treasury Department and of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department. The question was presented to the Secretary of the Treasury whether he would provide for this furniture or whether he would deprive the citizens of these cities of the right given to them by the Post-Office Department to the free-delivery system because of the lack of the necessary facilities to carry it out. A large part of this deficiency grows out of the fact that this furniture has had to be furnished to cities in the South to which the free-delivery system has been extended.

Mr. DAWES. Can the gentleman give us the name of the officer who has expended this money without an appropriation? The law is very explicit. The gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has been trying for a long time to find out the official who stands up in face of the law and says that he has spent money which has not been appropriated by Congress. Can the gentleman tell us who he is?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will if the gentleman will give me a chance; but if he occupies all my time I cannot do it.

Mr. DAWES. I hope he will tell us the name of the officer.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I was about doing it when I was interrupted by the gentleman. I would say that there has been no actual expenditure of money.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; then there is no deficiency.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Yes, there is; because these articles of furniture have been supplied where they were needed, and the men who supplied them have not been paid and are awaiting the passage of this bill that they may be paid.

Mr. RANDALL. Who assumed the responsibility on the part of the Government of running the Government into this debt?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman says that there is not any deficiency.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the Chair will decide who has the floor. I would like to know if the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or myself is making this speech?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER in the chair.) The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I supposed the gentleman would allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I will do so if the gentleman asks that privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. Well; I will not ask it now.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Very well; that will suit me exactly; I hope the gentleman will not.

Another thing is this: there are more than two hundred public buildings, custom-houses, and post-offices in the United States that have to be supplied with furniture by the Treasury Department. The expenditures for that purpose have been only made when deemed necessary. The officers in charge of the buildings themselves have made the purchases without authority from Washington, have ordered such furniture as they needed. For instance, a table or a desk breaks down, or something of that kind occurs; the collector of the port or the postmaster orders it to be replaced, and the bill is sent to the Department. That is the way in which these matters have come about all over the United States. The sum total for these expenditures for furniture for post-offices and custom-houses has been $30,000, and I hope the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

Mr. DAWES. I understand my friend to say that the officers of the Government all around judge for themselves of the necessity of expenditures for furniture and other things in their offices.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Permit me to say that I intended to make no such assertion. They have no such power. It is only when the propriety of it is so evident that they cannot refuse to do it that they order these things, and the Department approves them. In a great many instances they are not approved by the Department; only when the necessity for it is obvious.

Mr. DAWES. I knew that they had no authority to do so, because the law is as plain as it can be that they had no such authority; that I knew before. But the gentleman says that when in their opinion it is so obviously necessary that they must do it, then they go and do it, and the Department approves their bills. I know that is true also; I have had some experience in this matter.

But the gentleman has not answered my question, has not told us who the officer is that does these things. He has told us that in a great many instances there is a need for this expenditure. It is very likely it seems so to the officer; but who ought to judge of that matter? Is the Congress of the United States, which under the Constitution is the only power to take money out of the Treasury, to be the judge of this, or is the officer to be the judge? Should he wait until Congress makes the appropriation, or should he judge of the necessity of the expenditure and make it without appropriation?

Year after year we go on making these appropriations for deficiencies which these officers incur on the plea that they thought they were absolutely necessary, although there is a law which forbids their doing any such thing as that. Next year they will say, "Well, the deficiency of last year was paid, and the deficiency of this year will be paid also." And the limit which Congress puts upon its appropriations thus becomes futile and is rendered nugatory, and will continue to be so unless Congress can at the same time say to these men, "If you do not regard the law, you must meet your own deficiencies." I hope the Congress of the United States will for once say that they will not make an appropriation to meet a deficiency incurred in violation of law by men who keep their heads out of sight and who hide the reasons and the necessity for their acts behind the committee, which is made to believe in the generalities, for I have no doubt the gentleman honestly believes that there was this necessity. But he does not give this House the means of knowing what the necessity was, because the men who made the expenditure do not tell him what it is. They say that they thought it was highly proper and necessary to fit up any new building with carpets and furniture. The Supervising Architect thinks it is altogether folly to erect a large, splendid cut-stone court-house or post-office and not have it thoroughly furnished. But the Congress of the United States has thought it worth while to put some limit on the amount to be expended in furniture. Why, then, does the gentleman stand up here between these men and the Congress of the United States and not permit Congress to know why it is and for what it is that the law is being violated continually?

Mr. CLEMENTS. Would it be in order to move to lay this bill on the table? The logic of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is that these deficiencies are all illegal, and therefore we should make no appropriation for them.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. One word only in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] When I was on the floor before I endeavored with all the ability I possessed to tell how these deficiencies arose. I agree with the gentleman perfectly that it is necessary for officers of the Government to confine their expenditure to the appropriations made by Congress. I will answer for one Department of the Government that such will be the case. I pledged myself to the gentleman from Massachusetts and the House that the last deficiency bill which will be asked for under the supervision of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has been presented to this Congress. Certainly while I continue to occupy the position I now hold I never will report in favor of a single dollar of deficiency more. But I hope that the House will concur in this recommendation of the committee and pass this item.

Mr. RANDALL. Now let us have a vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single word before the vote is taken. I think gentlemen are able to appreciate the effect of a law only when they consider it in connection with other laws relating to the subject. We have a general statute forbidding deficiencies, forbidding expenditures and contracts for expenditures beyond the amounts appropriated. I stand on that law as strongly and firmly as any man here. But when Congress puts also in another law a specific thing to be done, then it carries with it the power and necessity on the part of the officer in charge to have that thing done. Now, for instance, we put last year into the law a provision extending the money-order offices. We have greatly extended the money-order business as well as the carrier system, and these things taken together have required additional desks and fixtures in the large post-offices in most of the cities in the country, and to accommodate that business warranted by the law, but not contemplated in the mind of Congress when we made the ordinary or much less than the ordinary appropriation for the furniture of the public buildings, this appropriation is required. Growing out of the extension of the money-order business and of the carrier system, there is a necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. DAWES. When Congress orders a specific thing to be done and then appropriates so much to pay for it, if that is not enough, can they then go on and expend beyond that appropriation?

Mr. GARFIELD. I said no such thing. I say when Congress makes an ordinary appropriation and then passes an independent measure not at all connected with the appropriation bill, when we enact that a special thing shall be done, that order carries with it authority to make the necessary expenditure.

Mr. DAWES. Let me see whether I understand the gentleman from Ohio. If you fix in an appropriation bill the limit of appropriation to be expended for a specific purpose and you order in another bill that specific purpose, according to the gentleman's theory the Department is authorized to go beyond the appropriation? Do I understand you correctly?

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir. The order of Congress in reference to the extension of the carrier system was later than the appropriation bill. After the passage of the appropriation bill Congress made a specific order that specific things should be done. It seems to me the decision of the Supreme Court lately made, which is called to my attention, touches almost precisely the same point.

Mr. BURCHARD. I wish to understand about this money-order extension. We are told this extension to the money-order system was only extended to small offices, where they are required to pay for their own furniture. The committee reported to the House an appropriation for $150,000. The Department asked for $200,000. They came again and asked for $200,000. The committee again reported $150,000. Last year when the House appropriated $150,000 they said that the Department should not expend more than $150,000. How then can we bring them down to this limit, if year after year, when we have fixed the amount to be expended in the appropriation bill, we come with an amendment appropriating in the deficiency bill the remaining $50,000?

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for a vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 80.

So, no further count being demanded, the amendment was non-concurred in.

The seventh amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

For paper, engraving, printing, express charges, and other expenses of making and issuing the national currency required to complete the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, $20,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the national currency here referred to are the legal-tender notes and currency of that character, and not national-bank paper. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether it is the national-bank notes or the legal-tender notes?

Mr. GARFIELD. The national-bank currency.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will non-concur.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is due to an unusual amount of mutilated national-bank notes. I will submit as a part of my remarks the following letters from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and of the Comptroller of the Currency?

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the inclosed copy of a letter of the Comptroller of the Currency respecting the necessity of providing for an appropriation of $30,000 for expenses of national currency, namely: paper, engraving, printing, express charges, and other expenses of making and issuing the national currency required to complete the service of the current fiscal year. In addition to the statement made by the Comptroller, I beg to add that if the $4,000,000 of national currency allotted to the Southern and Western States should be called for immediately, without this appropriation the Department will have no means to print and deliver the same.

Very respectfully,

F. A. SAWYER,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, D. C., April 27, 1874.

SIR: The appropriation for the expenses of engraving and printing national-bank currency for fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, is entirely exhausted.

It is necessary that a further appropriation of $30,000 shall be made for the balance of the fiscal year. This deficiency is caused by the increase of the printing of a large number of small notes required to replace mutilated notes destroyed.

I respectfully request that the amount of $30,000 shall be provided for in the deficiency bill.

Very respectfully,

JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

They ask for $30,000, but the Senate thought $20,000 was sufficient, and in that amendment we recommend concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the national banks can be justified in insisting that this appropriation should be made out of the Treasury for the purpose of paying for reprinting their notes, but the national banks ought to be taxed themselves to pay for their own currency.

It is quite manifest that if this were a legitimate subject of legislation upon an appropriation bill money should not be appropriated out of the national Treasury for the issue or reissue of the national-bank paper. The 1 per cent. tax paid by the national banks is all that they pay to this Government for the $354,000,000 of money issued to them by the Government. In addition to that we keep up a Bureau—the office of the Comptroller of the Currency—for the superintendence of their business, involving an expenditure of over $250,000 a year. I have understood from the national banking act of 1862, as amended by the act of 1863–'64, that not only the original issue of national-bank paper must be at the expense of the national Treasury, but also all the reissues occurring from time to time. The language of our appropriation bills has been so obscure that this fact has not appeared. Most members of the House would regard the language "national currency" as more applicable to the issues of the Government, the legal-tender notes, than to the issues of the national banks.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that the legal-tender notes are known in law only as United States notes; they are never called "national currency" in any of our laws. The two terms are perfectly distinct and well understood, running through all the banking acts and the loan acts. The one term is "United States notes," the other is "national-bank notes," or "national currency."

Mr. HOLMAN. It occurs to me that the reason there has not been heretofore a provision definitely requiring that this expenditure for the issue or reissue of money for the benefit of the national banks should be paid out of their funds, in addition to the 1 per cent. tax which they pay under the original banking act, is that there has been great confusion resulting, as my friend from Ohio must observe, from the use of these terms. The law sometimes speaks of "United States Treasury notes." I know that in strictness the term "Treasury notes" applies only to interest-bearing issues of the Government; and that "United States notes" is the name by which the legal-tender notes are known under the law. But at the same time the terms have been confused; so that time and again appropriations have been made out of the public Treasury for the benefit of the national banking currency, under the term "national currency." It has been the general impression that such expenditures were on account of the notes issued by the Government.

I do not know that it would be legitimate to insist upon incorporating in an appropriation bill a provision that this expense should be assessed against the national banks; but I am very confident that such would be the true policy; that the 1 per cent. tax paid by the national banks should not be considered as all that they are to pay in consideration of the expenses incurred by the Government in their behalf. In point of fact the national banks are exempted from all charges whatever in connection with their currency; the tax paid by them instead of inuring to the benefit of the public Treasury inures to the benefit of the national banks alone.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire here and now to repel the idea that the tax of 1 per cent. imposed upon the banks is in any manner whatever taken for the purpose of printing their notes. It goes into the common fund just as any other tax-payer's money does. There is no reason whatever why the national banks should not pay for reprinting their notes. When we remember that we give them an entire monopoly in the business which they conduct and attach to it a credit in virtue of which every citizen feels secure in the deposit of his money with them, the position taken by the national banks and by the Comptroller of the Treasury in reference to this subject has no justification whatever either in equity or morals.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by adding thereto the following:

To be assessed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the national banking associations on the basis of their respective circulation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the amendment proposes new legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. The amendment is not in order.

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, there were—ayes 71, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the yeas and nays. We may as well understand whether we are legislating for the Government or the national banks.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 12, noes not counted.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The House divided on concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and the tellers reported—ayes 104, noes 47.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The following amendment was read:

Insert as a new paragraph the following:
To complete the grading and erection of stone wall around the Columbia Hospital, $8,500.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] whether this is one of the appropriations rendered necessary by the system of improvement inaugurated in this city by the board of public works?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is in part rendered necessary in that way. The change of grade left the grounds of the hospital in a dangerous condition, so that in order to render the building secure from falling it was necessary to erect this wall.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is for the wall alone, and not for the improvement of the streets?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not for the improvement of the street. This is for the grading on the grounds and approaches to the building, made necessary by the change of grading of the street. It is not for the street at all.

The amendment was concurred in.

The twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

For defraying the expenses of the board of health of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, $31,570.

The committee recommended concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have some explanation of this. In the deficiency bill a year ago there was, if my memory serves me right, an appropriation of $39,000 for this same board of health.

Mr. GARFIELD. The board of health came before the Committee on Appropriations early in the session, before we had completed this bill, and the committee directed them to go before the Committee on the District of Columbia for a preliminary examination as to what they had done and as to the necessities for this appropriation. The report of that committee did not reach us at the time of our regular action on this bill. It came to us, however, after the bill had been reported; but not wishing to offer any amendment in the House or to agitate the matter there, we declined to act at all upon the subject. They took their papers and went before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and the Senate inserted this appropriation. The same papers have been laid before our committee, with a detailed statement of the expenses of the board of health during the past year. I hold in my hand, and will have printed, that statement with my remarks.

Upon the general question I wish to say this: The House is aware that the board of health is an organization created by Congress. The members of the board of health are appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, under the laws of Congress. The salaries of the board of health are provided for in our regular appropriation bill. If we hope ever to establish proper relations between the District of Columbia and the Government there must sooner or later be some determination, some fixing by law, what proportion the Government ought to pay and what proportion the District ought to pay in regard to all these expenses. Last year it will be remembered that the small-pox visited this city. We were for a time in very imminent danger of suffering from it, and a matter of that sort could not be ignored by the Congress of the United States. It affected the health and safety of all the employés of the Government, as well as of Congress itself. The appropriation was made by last Congress for defraying the expenses of the board of health of $39,000, which was supposed to be the reasonable share which ought to be borne by the Government of the United States of these expenses. The fiscal year ended in the heated term, and the board of health being charged by the law with suppressing nuisances and taking care of everything that affected the public health, considered themselves authorized to take whatever steps were necessary. They erected a pest-hospital, or obtained one, out of the limits of the city to which they took persons affected with the small-pox.

They have policed the city so far as sanitary measures are concerned. They have inspected the sales of fish and of fresh meats in the markets, and we are satisfied that the board of health have behaved with commendable zeal and efficiency in the way in which they have done their work. They claim to have reduced the death rate in this city from 23 to 14 per thousand.

It may be that the expenditures ought to have been made by the District government, but the District government for the time being is crippled and is not doing its requisite share of the work. But without entering into the merits of that question at all, it being one that belongs to a committee yet to report, the Committee on Appropriations considered that this work ought to go on and by some means should be carried through.

The following is the statement I have referred to:

Comparative statement of mortality showing percentage of deaths to each one thousand inhabitants.

1870	23.81
1871	21.09
1872	18.42

No appropriations for sanitary purposes or for the protection of health of the residents of Washington and the District, other than the $69,000 above referred to, have ever been made by Congress.

The estimates herein referred to were made and presented to Congress in January, 1873, at which time small-pox prevailed in an epidemic form throughout the District, and was not stamped out until the following September.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

D. W. BLISS, M. D.,
Secretary Board of Health.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire that the gentleman from Ohio should inform the House on two points: First, what proportion of the expenditures for the board of health for the current year will be borne by the United States if this appropriation be made; in the next place, whether this money is to be paid over directly to the board of health, or to go to the persons to whom this money is due? I suppose the board of health may be in the same condition as I am informed some other institutions of the District are; it may have issued certificates, or something of that sort, so that in fact persons who have performed the work for them have not received their pay. I should like to know whether there is any need of any precautionary legislation to see that this money is paid to the persons who have actually performed the service.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not. I yield to the Delegate from the District, [Mr. CHIPMAN,] who is familiar with the statistics.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House more than a few minutes on this subject. In reply to the gentleman from Vermont I will say that the board of health have been obliged to anticipate this expenditure, otherwise it would not be a deficiency. The accounts are outstanding about the city against the board. They have not attempted to create any sort of indebtedness in the form of certificates, but the accounts are outstanding to the extent of this deficiency nearly. The appropriation will be used to pay the creditors of the board.

On the second point referred to by the gentleman from Vermont I desire to say that the expenditures by the District for this board of health, since its organization, have been $155,416.58; while the expenditures on the part of Congress have been $69,300, making an excess of expenditure on the part of the District over that of the General Government of $86,116.58. The District therefore has in point of fact paid two-thirds of the expense of the board, which I think is quite as much as the District ought to pay.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How is it for the current year?

Mr. CHIPMAN. This appropriation is for expenses incurred during the current year.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. You mean that this appropriation will make the Government pay one-half. Will it not make the Government pay one-half of the expense?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Yes; this appropriation will make the sum appropriated by the Government one-half of that appropriated by the District.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the Delegate from the District tell me what propriety there is in the United States Government paying two-fifths of the money necessary to preserve the health of this city?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will give the gentleman my theory on the subject with a great deal of pleasure. I think it is the duty of the Government to protect the health of its employés here. There are about ten thousand persons in this city in the service of the Government. You have no right to bring them here and keep them in a fetid atmosphere. You are bound honorably to provide some sort of health protection. You are under the same obligation in regard to the foreign legations, and those who are obliged to come to Washington to conduct public business. I think if you could strike a fair division between the needs of the Government on the point of health and those of the permanent residents here, you would find that instead of two-fifths being due from the Government it should be two-thirds. Is the gentleman answered?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; I have listened to your answer.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will add one more point, and that is that Congress has created this board of health and imposed on it certain obligations, and Congress must provide the means of discharging those obligations. We are doing on the part of the District all we can.

Mr. RANDALL. I can only say in reply to the Delegate that it seems to me that all moneys expended in connection with such matters as this relating to the health of the citizens here are local matters and in the nature of municipal appropriations, and I have never yet been able to bring my mind to see the justice and equity of any such charge being made against the Government of the United States.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman knows that mortality here and sickness must extend not only to the local inhabitants, but that these provisions in regard to disease are provisions for the benefit not only of those who are obliged to live here permanently, but of those who come here like the gentleman to serve the country. He is here six months in the year and ought to be protected by the Government in a wholesome atmosphere.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not ask the Government to pay my doctors' bills.

Mr. CHIPMAN. You ought to have no doctors' bills; you ought to be able to be in your seat every day; you ought to be able to keep well so as to be always here, as you are a useful member.

Mr. RANDALL. Ah! if you will guarantee me that I will not object to the appropriation.

Mr. STORM. I hope that if the board of health receives this appropriation they will pay for the property they have taken. In a number of cases I know that they have given receipts for property taken two or three years ago and they have refused up to this day to pay one cent for it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. This appropriation is in part to pay those very expenditures.

Mr. STORM. Well, then, I hope that if this appropriation is made they will pay for the property they have taken and destroyed.

Mr. CHIPMAN. In order that the action of the board of health may not be misunderstood in that particular, I will state that where they found a small-pox patient who was liable to spread contagion they not only removed the patient to the pest-house, but were obliged to destroy his clothing. That action created a just debt which, I am sorry to say, in many instances has not been paid.

Mr. STORM. There was money appropriated to the board a year ago out of which these debts should have been paid. I know of a poor woman living here on Capitol Hill whose furniture was all taken and destroyed, and she has been to the board several times asking for payment and has not yet been paid.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The forty-first amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 892 strike out "$25,185" and insert in lieu thereof "$16,815;" so that it will read:

To pay the five Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House (said reporters to be paid monthly) during the second year of the Forty-third Congress, $16,815.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence in the amendment, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment and insert at the end of the paragraph, after the word "dollars," in line 24, page 28 of the bill, these words: "Which shall hereafter be the annual compensation of the five reporters of the House proceedings."

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask what that would make the salary?

Mr. GARFIELD. Five thousand dollars a year apiece. I desire at this point to offer on my own responsibility an amendment, which I did not offer in the committee, for the consideration of the House. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, and it is to add these words:

And hereafter the pay of the official reporters for the committees of the House shall be $5,000 each.

I desire to say that the salaries of these officers were cut down because by the law passed earlier in the session the pay of the Official Reporters of debates was cut down. I think we ought to put the two classes of reporters on a level, and it is with that object that I offer this amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that; I think it is only fair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand the amendment reported by the gentleman from Ohio. Is it proposed to non-concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. GARFIELD. We propose to concur, with an amendment; and if the House will bear with me a moment, I desire to make a statement in regard to the condition of our work in this matter of reporting.

When we fixed the pay of the reporters of the House and the reporters of the Senate early in this session, it was then understood, and from the evidence before us it appeared to be true, that the amount of reporting for the two bodies was about equal. But the experience of this session, under the new régime, in regard to the reporting and printing of the debates of the respective bodies, has shown that almost twice as much labor is imposed upon the reporters of the House as upon the reporters of the Senate. The account which has been given to me by one of our reporters shows that the proceedings and debates of the House up to and including the report for June 5, 1874, amount to 6,139 columns; while the proceedings and debates of the Senate for the same time amount to 4,035 columns; making a difference of 2,104 columns of excess of House proceedings since the session began.

In addition to that, it ought to be remembered that it is a vastly more difficult business to report the proceedings of this House than it is to report the proceedings of the Senate. I witness, with a feeling of marvel every day, the work of these reporters in catching what is said in the turbulence and noise and confusion of the House. And I think the House will bear me out in the statement that on the whole our proceedings are reported with great faithfulness. I believe we made a mistake when we allowed the salaries of our reporters to be cut down as they were. Another thing; if gentlemen will look at the fourteenth amendment of the Senate they will observe that the Senate has put in an appropriation of $36,000 for the reporter of the Senate. Of course we propose to non-concur in that amendment, because we do not understand what are the merits of it, or just why they have put it in. But in order to bring the question fairly before the House, the Committee on Appropriations thought it their duty to offer this amendment, that we might have a clear understanding of the case.

I will say now that when this provision in regard to the House reporters was put into this bill, I did not clearly understand it; I had not carefully examined precisely the range it took. And in order that there might not be any misunderstanding about it, I spoke to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] telling him that I was apprehensive that the amendment put in did not follow the law. I have since gone over the whole ground, have looked at all the facts, and I am satisfied we will do great injustice to the House reporters if we put their pay on a level with that of the Senate reporters, at least if that level is maintained where it now is.

I ought also to call attention to the fact that in order to keep up with the current debates of this House and enable us to see a printed record of our debates the next day, to have on our tables the next morning what is said in the House the preceding day, the reporters are compelled to hire assistants and pay them a very large amount.

Mr. CONGER. And work day and night.

Mr. GARFIELD. Day and night, of course. Gentlemen here have on their tables now what was said in the House last night up to nearly ten o'clock. Of course it is a very onerous duty which these reporters perform, besides requiring great expertness. I am satisfied if they are given a salary of $5,000 each, and the reporters of the committees are placed upon the same basis, that would be right. I ought to mention in this connection that I am told by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, [Mr. BUFFINTON,] that the special reports called for by the various investigating committees will require a deficiency, and I expected that by this time that deficiency would be brought in, but it has not yet been presented. I am speaking now wholly of what the salaries of these reporters ought to be, and to that I challenge the attention and judgment of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should have made the point of order on this amendment in regard to the reporters of this House had I noticed it at the moment it was introduced. It is clear that it is not in order. It is not a simple temporary appropriation, making an increase in the salary from $4,200 to $5,000 for a single year, but it is a permanent change of the law passed the present session of Congress, which law fixed the pay of our reporters and the Senate reporters at $4,200 a year each.

If any gentleman in this House is bound in good faith to observe its rules in regard to the appropriation bills, I submit that it is the chairmain of the Committee on Appropriations. My friend must know that in changing the law passed at the present session of Congress fixing these salaries, making a permanent change not a mere temporary appropriation, he was violating the rules of this House. All I regret is that the point of order was not made upon the amendment. Now the subject is before the House it must be decided.

I should have no hope at all of a reduction of the salary of any officer of this Government or of keeping salaries as low as even their present excessive rates if the tendency shown during the last few months to general extravagance is to continue. Nothing seems to be fixed in regard to salaries except the fact that they are to be constantly increased. When Congress first met many salaries increased last year were reduced. You appointed a committee of conference to fix the salaries of your reporters, which resulted in the present salaries of $4,200 each. These gentlemen are performing their duties faithfully and well in our presence here. We all know them and enjoy friendly intercourse with them. If we yield to their demands for an increase of their salaries, we will lay the foundation for increasing the salaries of others. We have seen over and over again the effect of these precedents. Thus day by day during this session of Congress you have remorselessly increased salary after salary, in this House, in the Treasury and State Departments. You have a Committee on Civil Service Reform, so called, and yet their entire efforts have been to increase salaries. They have not proposed a decrease in a single instance.

Mr. MAYNARD. How much does the gentleman think would be a proper sum to give to these officers?

Mr. HOLMAN. What the law fixes.

Mr. FORT. I do not think the gentleman——

Mr. HOLMAN. I decline to be interrupted at this moment. I answer the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] that the proper sum to be paid to the reporters is the sum fixed by your committee of conference and enacted into a law less than three months ago, a sum applicable alike to your reporters of debates, the Senate reporters, and your reporters of committees, $4,200 a year. And the gentleman from Ohio informs the House that it was by a mistake that the appropriation in this deficiency bill was run up from the sum of $4,200 a year to $5,000. The Senate, more mindful to its duty under the law, has put back the appropriation to what it had been fixed by law. Now the House is called upon not only to reject the Senate amendment, which makes the appropriation correspond to the law, but to go a step further—to change the law itself, and fix the salary at the increased rate of $5,000 for each reporter. If we do this, of course the Senate will increase the appropriation for its reporters to the same sum.

I say to the House now that since we commenced the publication of the debates through the agency of the Government Printing Office the salaries of our reporters have been materially increased. We have within the last two years had a steady increase in the salaries of the gentlemen connected with our corps of reporters. You are proposing now to pay them more than you ever paid them before, while the Senate is proposing to stand by the law so recently enacted. It is the House that presses this increase; the trouble arises here. And why? Because gentlemen controlling these bills yield so freely to every demand for an increase of salary, the tendency in that direction being encouraged by the misnamed Committee on Civil Service Reform.

Mr. FORT. I wish to make a suggestion to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] He is entitled to great credit for his efforts in keeping down salaries and reducing expenditures, and I generally vote with him in that direction; but I do not see how he can come in here and with very good grace decline to pay these reporters well, considering the fact that he occupies their time more than any four or five members of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to the fact that the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations would in its present form render this whole paragraph nugatory.

Mr. GARFIELD. We propose to retain the words which the Senate propose to strike out, and to insert, instead of the words which they propose to insert, these words: "which shall hereafter be the annual compensention of the five reporters of the House proceedings."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment as now stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concur in the Senate amendment, with an amendment restoring the words "$25,185;" striking out the words "$16,815" and adding these words: "which shall hereafter be the annual compensation of the five reporters of the House proceedings."

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in regard to the committee reporters, by adding thereto a limitation; so that it will read as follows:

And hereafter the pay of the official reporters for committees of the House shall be $5,000 each; and this shall be in lieu of all other compensation for such services in reporting the proceedings of each and all of said committees.

I desire to state my reason for offering this amendment. If we fix the pay of the two reporters of committees at $5,000 a year each, to which I do not object, then we ought to provide that this compensation shall be in lieu of all other charges.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to accepting the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say a word further. Each one of these gentlemen sitting in front of us—the reporters of debates—is obliged to employ one or two assistants; and this they do out of their own pockets, out of the salary which we allow them. There is no reason why the two gentlemen who do the reporting of committees should not in just the same way pay all the assistants that they may require. I am the more impressed with the propriety of this, because I know that during the greater part of the present session one of those two gentlemen has been absent while under the pay of the House and has been employed by another Department of the Government on an entirely different duty, in the discharge of which his expenses have been paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. To whom is the gentleman referring?

Mr. RANDALL. I allude to Mr. Francis H. Smith. Thus, in fact, the Government has absolutely been paying him two salaries. In addition to that, these two gentlemen, as I understand, have a copyist, called a "messenger," on the rolls of some one of the officers of this House. Now I maintain that this is an abuse; and my amendment cuts directly to the core of that abuse.

Mr. GARFIELD. I accept the gentleman's amendment as part of mine.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have sought the floor for the purpose of putting on record in this debate what I think ought to go there in connection with the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] providing, as I understand, that the two committee reporters shall receive each $5,000 a year. Now I wish the gentleman to state—and I desire the statement to go into the RECORD as a part of this discussion—whether by that the gentleman means that those reporters shall take the risk of reporting more or less according to the exigencies of the business from time to time among the different committees; so that if at any time there is more than the usual amount of work they may do it for the salary here stipulated, while if it should happen to be less they would get the benefit of the diminished amount of work.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire that those reporters shall take the chance of much or little work. But I did not tell all, Mr. Speaker, when I was up before. And now that the gentleman calls my attention somewhat to it I will say this, that while this officer whom I have named has been absent another gentleman, Mr. Devine, has been employed to do this work, and that the Government is now asked in addition to pay Mr. Devine's expenses. Am I not correct?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not remember whether Devine is the gentleman's name, but I know that an account has been sent in to our committee.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Banking and Currency have been charged $800 for reporting an investigation which should have been reported by the absent reporter.

Mr. MAYNARD. The bills presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency for reporting amount to nearly $1,000. The work has undoubtedly been done, and those who have done it ought to be paid. That is beyond doubt.

Mr. RANDALL. And those who have not done the work ought not to be paid.

Mr. MAYNARD. The point I wish to have brought out in connection with this amendment, which I am not opposing, is that if it be adopted I hope it will be understood that whoever assumes to take that place for the salary offered in the amendment must understand that he assumes to do all the reporting that all the committees of the House require to be done, be it much or be it little.

The question being taken on Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment as modified, there were—ayes 85, noes 3; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think on this increase of salary there should be a vote of a full House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 133, noes 18.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon this increase of salary.

Mr. FORT. This is no increase of salary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to get the yeas and nays if I can have them.

Mr. RANDALL. My amendment is in the nature of a limitation.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is an increase from a salary of $4,200 as fixed by law to $5,000.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 3; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused, and the amendment was agreed to.

The question was on concurring in the Senate amendment with the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Agreeing to the amendment to the amendment is merely a formal matter. The substantial thing now occurring is that the House is increasing the salary from $4,200, the amount fixed by law, to $5,000 for each of the five reporters of the debates and two reporters of the committees. That is the proposition on which the House is now called to vote.

During the last session of the last Congress there was a general increase of salaries, including the reporters. But the Congress which came here as their successors were supposed to be committed and pledged to economy and retrenchment. Republicans and democrats had alike proclaimed themselves on every stump in the country in favor of retrenchment of expenditures; and when Congress assembled, yielding to the popular demand, they were compelled to repeal the law of 3d of March last. But the impulse of reform was exhausted, and from that time to this there has been no proposition looking to retrenchment. Some clerks are to be dismissed, but even this is compensated by increased salaries to others, and there has been no proposition from a committee concerning salaries which has not looked to an increase.

Constantly this work goes on of increasing the salaries of the employés of this House and the country. Increasing salaries seems to be deemed the highest and most imperative duty of legislation.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I would like to ask my friend from Indiana whether, from his experience of many years, he does not really and honestly believe that these men do as much work as any member of this House? The pay of a member at $5,000 is not regarded as too much; and it is known to all of us, and I think no one knows better than the gentleman from Indiana, that these men do as much work as any member of this House, not excepting the gentleman from Indiana himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend forgets one fact, that he himself voted to fix the salaries of these employés of the House some two months ago at $4,200. Did the gentleman think it was wrong then? Did he think the salary too low?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer the question in due time.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. My question was whether the gentleman does not honestly believe that the services of these men are worth as much as the services of any member of Congress?

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall answer the question; but at the same time I put the question to him whether a few months ago he did not vote, when the voice of the people was ringing in our ears demanding retrenchment, that the salaries of these gentlemen should be $4,200?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the gentleman exercise a little patience. I ask him whether he did not vote to fix the salaries at $4,200, which was in fact an increase over the former appropriation until the increase by the act of March 3, 1873, made for the same purpose?

Now I have to say that some of us are able to be very impartial in such a matter, for these reporters have our good wishes very naturally. We like them personally. We are in daily association with them. Most of us are gratified by the accuracy with which they report the remarks which we have occasion to make to the House from day to day. Therefore naturally our feelings and sympathies are with these gentleman who report our debates. But we fixed their salary by law at $4,200, and in my judgment it was a reasonable salary. And I will tell you more, sir. It was a salary, everything considered, fully up to the average of the salaries paid by this Government, and greatly beyond the salaries paid in civil life, competency considered. I say that without any hesitation, and with a full knowledge of the capacity of the gentlemen employed. We all concede their competency. In the period of two years of course these gentlemen are actually employed about nine months, and yet received full salaries for two years. The salary was fixed fully up to what is paid in other employments, where the same amount of ability is required. But why talk; why make any disturbance here in the House in regard to what seems to be proper and reasonable salaries? Why attempt to resist here the constant increase of expenditure, the endless growth of salaries, when everybody knows there will be no retrenchment until it is compelled by the people themselves?

Democrats and republicans come into this Congress upon the platform of reform, and yet scarcely a voice is heard here from either side of the House in favor of reform except it may be in set speeches after the occasion is past. On the contrary, gentlemen vote steadily in favor of new offices and greater salaries without a protest. I have never before known either side of this House to be so indifferent to the question of increase of salaries as is the present Congress. The effort to repeal the salaries of March 3, 1873, was exhaustive. The gentleman from Ohio himself reported the bill to this House to fix the reporters' salaries at $4,200 a year each. And now before the law fixing that salary is fairly enrolled and filed with the Secretary of State he reports in favor of increasing it to $5,000 a year. Who can hope for retrenchment or for a reduction of expenditures when such is the policy of the financial leader of this House and there is no opposition by the republican leaders?

When the democratic opposition here was but sixty or seventy members, they could and did at least compel a record to be made of their opposition. But where is the opposition now to this extravagance; where are the safeguards of a strong and vigorous opposition intended in this House to secure wise and prudent legislation which the country has been accustomed to rely on for the last half-century? Where is that vigorous opposition party of former times which should demand that the expenditures of the Government should be reduced to the actual wants and necessities of the public service and the taxes wrung from the industries of the people no longer used for purposes of favoritism and patronage? Sir, the people will see to it that there is an opposition in this House sufficient to stem this torrent of extravagance in public expenditures.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to make a suggestion to my distinguished friend from Indiana, and see whether we cannot harmonize our views upon this matter, so that we may be able to pay these gentlemen what we will all regard as a fair compensation, and at the same time avoid any inadequacy of pay. I submit to him whether it would not be well to fix the price of reporting at so much per hundred words, say fifteen or twenty cents, as the case may be, and then keep an account with every member of Congress, and put against his name as his share of the expense of reporting the amount of what he may have said, and let the account be so made out against him?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes; and I will vote to abolish your corps of reporters and your RECORD entirely. It is a charge on the Treasury for the benefit of members of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hoped my friend would accept my suggestion, but he does not seem to be willing to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. One word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana. I do not consider it very politic or statesman-like, either in a great majority party or a minority party, to do injustice. As one of the minority here I am in favor of giving adequate salaries.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say but a few words. In whatever the gentleman from Indiana does in the direction of real, genuine, economy he has the sympathy of all good men; but when he denounces as he does day by day every appropriation as a swindle and fraud, a grasping, remorseless attack on the Treasury, it comes to be a little tiresome, especially if repeated seven or eight hundred times; certainly it does become tiresome. Now, the gentleman has a great deal of cheek; he must in this instance have a cheek reaching down to the shoulder, yes, on both sides reaching absolutely down to the shoulder, to get up here and say to this House that we are raising salaries and increasing expenditures, and making no retrenchment at all, when he is talking about a bill which lies right under his nose, appropriating but $3,000,000 for deficiencies as against $11,000,000 last year. Not once since the war have we seen in Congress a deficiency bill so small as this. In no year since the war have the deficiencies been less than twice, sometimes five or six times, and once seven times, as great as are the deficiencies of this year. Since the war ended we have had a deficiency of $20,000,000 in a single year. As I said before, we had a deficiency last year of $11,000,000. Yet in the face of a series of reductions, amounting in the total to $30,000,000 in our appropriations, the gentleman from Indiana gets up here and sings the same old everlasting song that we are raising salaries and increasing expenses everywhere.

Now, in regard to the reporters, the base of our operations is changed. We took the printing of the debates away from the Globe office and put it in our own printing establishment. Before that time we did not pay the Globe reporters at all, except a small sum, enough to make them officers of the House. Therefore, having ourselves taken upon our own hands the work of reporting and publishing the debates, it became necessary that we ourselves should employ the reporters and fix their salaries, and a separate bill was brought in for that purpose. In the judgment of several members of the committee of conference that had charge of the matter, the salary of our reporters should have been fixed at a higher rate than that bill eventually fixed it. But following the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana, who was on that committee, we put their salary at $4,200 a year. Now, for one, I have become satisfied that in fixing that salary we fixed it too low, and that it should be made higher.

If the gentleman will now agree that these reporters shall have, say, $3,000 a year for their services in reporting, and that we will pay assistants to do the copying for them, it will cost us more than the present proposition will. I will go further; I am on record in this House for at least the last six years as having offered propositions, and voting every time for such a proposition when offered, to abolish all reporting of our proceedings at the expense of the Government. I will vote for such a proposition any day and any hour, so that our debates may go for what they are worth in the markets of the world.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the people want reporters sent here to report our proceedings, let it be done as it is in England by outside parties.

Mr. DAWES. In other words, let us have one great daily paper in the city of New York to control the whole reporting of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know very well that such a proposition would not receive much support in this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should gladly vote with my friend from Ohio in favor of such a system.

Mr. GARFIELD. Upon that plan we would stand upon the merits of what we say.

Mr. DAWES. We would surrender ourselves, as we have partially done already, to the metropolitan press.

Mr. GARFIELD. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] it is not necessary for me to do more than remind the gentleman how the reporting of the English Parliament is done.

Mr. DAWES. What odds does it make to us how the thing may be done in England? There the London Times is the ruling power. Do we want to surrender ourselves to some one daily paper, like the London Times, in the metropolis of New York? The abolition of the franking privilege was to a certain extent a surrender by this Congress to the metropolitan press, so that the country press is coming to us every day for assistance.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very glad to have the concurrence of so distinguished a gentleman as my friend from Massachusetts on the subject of the metropolitan press. But not desiring to protract the debate on this question, which I think has been fairly stated on both sides, I move the previous question.

Mr. COX. I would like to say a word.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was on concurring in the amendment of the Senate as amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the whole paragraph as it now stands may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay the five Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House (said reporters to be paid monthly) during the second year of the Forty-third Congress, $25,185, which shall hereafter be the annual compensation of the five reporters of the House proceedings. And hereafter the pay of the official reporters for committees of the House shall be $5,000 each; and this shall be in lieu of all other compensation for such services in reporting the proceedings of each and all of said committees.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 107, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot consent to any increase of salary without the vote of a quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 139, noes 7.

So the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was concurred in.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

Insert the following as a new paragraph:

For the purchase of the original lot No. 1, square No. 683, in the city of Washington, containing about fifteen thousand superficial feet, with the improvements thereon, for a site for fire-engine house and for stables for mail-wagons and horses for the Senate, $18,000.

The SPEAKER. The committee recommend concurrence in this amendment with an amendment striking out the words "and for stables for mail-wagons and horses for the Senate."

Mr. GARFIFLD. We merely strike out the provision for stables. As to the engine-house, it will be remembered that we have already in another bill ordered the pulling down of that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that; and there was no necessity for its being done. The original wrong occurred when we entered upon this system of improvements. On this question I wish to say a word or two, though I am well aware how useless it is to attempt to arrest the attention of this House to any question of economy. In view of the promises of retrenchment and reform which were made to the people only two years ago, and the weight of taxation now resting upon the country and almost an empty Treasury, the spectacle of profound indifference to items of expenditure aggregating into millions displayed in this House at the present time and for months past is most remarkable.

Here is an item of the improvement entered upon some two or three years ago in connection with the grand system of embellishing this Capitol and giving magnificence to the public edifices and parks and grounds, which has involved, and is likely still to involve, the Treasury in the expenditure of many millions. In carrying out this system whole streets of houses were torn down, and this little item of $18,000 is to supply the place of one demolished. For my part I will not vote one dollar for any such purpose. The project of enlarging the Capitol grounds was, in my judgment, without justification or excuse, and it is one of those acts of legislation in which the original wrong necessitates thereafter a constant expenditure. If the House now votes the $18,000 here asked it shall not be said that it passed unchallenged, and that all the members of this House are responsible for it, as they were sought to be made responsible for the original appropriation, which took many hundred thousand dollars from the Treasury on the pretense of embellishing the grounds of the Capitol; but these beautiful grounds as laid out by our predecessors a half a century or more ago needed no such enlargement. It was, in fact, a part of that rank system of real-estate operations out of which millions have been made by successful adventurers through the aid of Congress at the expense not simply of the national Treasury but of the national honor.

Sir, we can never have a brilliant capital and magnificent insignias of government, such as gladdens the heart of the aristocrat and the monarchist, without profligate expenditure and wide-spread corruption. None knew better than members of this House, when, under the pretense of enlarging and beautifying the Capitol grounds and public parks and embellishing the capital, a vast system of expenditure was entered upon in every field of extravagance, that a splendid Government and a splendid capital, which should be a symbol of government, meant wide-spread demoralization, dishonor, and corruption. This District government and board of public works were a part of the system of contemplated brilliancy and national splendor. I protested against the measure at the time, I protest against it now. An honest, economical government, grand in its simplicity, was the magnificence gloried in by our fathers. I predict that if the gentlemen who are now occupying seats on this floor are incapable of grappling with the monstrous tide of corruption and fraud which finds its living springs in the laws enacted by Congress—these appropriation bills, moving on with apparently irresistible force to the overthrow even of the free institutions of our country in the not distant future; if we are incapable of arresting this ingulfing flood and restoring to Government its old honest simplicity, those who hold the power of this nation, not this House but the people, who are not corrupted nor ensnared by dishonest pretense, to whom honesty in government is true grandeur, who are incorruptible and have no interests to promote except the interests of their country, will see that these seats are filled by men who will arrest it and will restore honest simplicity to their Government; this, sir, or the days of the Republic are numbered.

Why, sir, the smile with which any resistance to appropriations in this House is met is almost universal and stifles resistance and the millions are voted without a protest. I have seen the time when the democracy in this House, though small in number, vigilant of the interests of the country, were prompt and obstinate in resisting extravagance. An unjustifiable appropriation was at least met by their protest. The old watch-word of economy you gentlemen were at least compelled to hear. They were, sir, like their constituents at home, determined to hold you responsible for the public dishonor that follows extravagance in Government. But now the old democratic spirit is not very demonstrative in this House. There is the absence of a positive opposition force. The overwhelming majority with its organized committees meets with but feeble opposition. We are seldom able to compel them to make even a record of their excessive appropriations. Gentlemen, this is not the temper of the people. The safety of the country is in a strong, fearless, resolute opposition party in Congress. If the opposition passively submits to excess of expenditure the pressure is all one way to open still wider and wider and wider the doors of the Treasury. We are seldom strong enough even to call the yeas and nays upon a question of expenditure; and yet here and there a member of the majority is with us, and many democrats adhere to the old principle that economy in Government is the only path of safety. But where is the strong, resolute, united opposition? Even a record cannot be made. Under these circumstances it is madness to hope even to keep within present limits the remorseless flood of expenditure, much less diminish the volume and strength of its current. The extravagance of Government now weighs heavily upon the industries of the country and makes the question of taxation (a matter so indifferent but a few years ago) a subject of terror and alarm to the people. Yes, sir, of alarm; for the people of this Republic know too well that extravagance in Government and corruption in Government are so united that no power can separate them. The brilliancy and magnificence of Government that take their hue from the treasures wrung from the labor of the people are the signs of death in a republic.

But, sir, thank God, the peril of the hour is not irremediable. There is a power that can and will restore economy and purity to the Government. There is no decay of public virtue in the people. Let me predict, sir, that there will be an opposition here that will resist this remorseless extravagance of Congress. Let me predict that there will be an opposition party in this House demanding with an authoritative voice that a record shall be made on every item of your expenditure, and that money shall not be expended simply because the majority, under the frantic pressure that bears on a party long in power to open wide the Treasury, yield to that pressure because it gives new stimulus and vitality to the machinery by which decayed political organizations long in power are kept up. Sir, the country had the right to expect an earnest and positive resistance to the extravagance of this Administration from the opposition element of the House; for if the opposition acquiesces in measures of extravagance favored by the majority and yet subject to no such pressure for extravagance as the majority, where is the public safety? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] can excuse himself perhaps on the ground of the pressure brought to bear upon him by that great army who are ever waiting and longing to rob your Treasury. The republican side of the House is at least able to fall back on the excuse, bad as it is, that it is their duty, coming as partisans into this Hall, to follow the lead and blindly sustain the measures of the leading committees of the House. Such is our daily experience. But no such influence is supposed to operate upon the minority. With them there is no motive except the well-being of the country. The opposition members of the House are the especial guardians of the Treasury against partisan patronage, and therefore the people look to them for a record to be made of stern resistance to extravagance. The public good demands such an opposition, fearless, resolute, scorning dishonest pretenses, a terror to the hungry army who ever press upon the Treasury. I indulge again in the prediction that this Hall will not be without a positive opposition party in the days that are coming, inspired with the spirit of their constituents; will not be without an opposition that is willing to assert itself, no matter how large the majority that controls the action of the House.

I have said time and again, sir, that I glory in the minority which I once saw here upon the other side of this House, who, when propositions were brought forward for any increase of expenditures, insisted that the reasons should not be only plausible, but reasons that appealed to the conscience and the judgment and to the public necessities, and unless such reasons were presented, resisted such increase to the bitter end. That party, now the majority, is in a state of hopeless decay. I have seen a handful of democrats a positive power here for good. But now, sir, a looker-on might suppose that one party—the party of appropriations and partisans and patronage—without opposition was the undisputed master of the situation, and this House and its members subject to exactly the same pressure, influenced by the same motives and purpose to keep up a decaying political organization, by appropriations from the people's Treasury, and that the object of legislation was partisan patronage. I say this; and yet it is true that many gentlemen around me have steadily fought the old fight and earnestly resisted the flagrant extravagance of the gentlemen who control the action of this House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly, I will.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would like to know of the gentleman from Indiana what hope there is that there will be any reform when the opposition party gets into power if they should vote, as many of them have voted this morning, for these extravagant expenditures?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am, sir, very indifferent to whatever answer may be returned to that question—quite indifferent about it. But I am not without hope of the future. I indulge with confidence the hope that there is a power capable of meeting the perils of the hour. I have confidence in the future, for the foundations of public virtue are secure. I do not believe that the public men of this country now controlling public affairs are capable of earnest and sincere reform in expenditures of the Government. The idea of a brilliant government supported by magnificent appropriations has been fatal to the men now controlling public affairs. They have drifted too long in the present and ever-swelling current to now turn and resist it.

The masses of the American people long for a government of their own, not of a government of a few ambitious leaders; a government administered for the people and not for the benefit of that great army who are struggling to live and amass fortunes out of the labor of other men, and who crowd your lobby with schemes to reach your Treasury. Yes, sir; the people want a government of the people for the people, and they will overturn the fabric of partisan power resting on venality and fraud, and place in power men inspired with their own spirit.

Sir, I care nothing about this item of appropriation in itself. It is but one of the countless items by which millions of excessive appropriations are made up, unwarranted and unnecessary. It is one of the springs that swell into the torrent. It is sufficient for me to know that this item and countless other items of expenditure are not necessary, and it furnishes me the occasion for condemning the rank extravagance that blisters every page of every appropriation that now comes into this House. But this must and will cease. The people will see to it that the men who shall take seats in this Hall do not forget the eloquent words that were uttered on the stump in the political campaign. Young gentlemen who come to this House sometimes make the fatal mistake of substituting the respectable gentlemen who surround them here for their constituents and substituting the opinions and sentiments prevalent in this Capitol for the opinions of the people and their constituents. It is a fatal mistake.

I say to young gentlemen entering this Hall, the first rule you should master if you expect to bear yourself as a free man representing free men is to utter no word here and cast no vote here you would not willingly and proudly do in the presence of your constituency. You must remember this: these gentlemen here are not your constituents, and that you should accustom yourself to feeling responsible for every act of legislation whether you be a member of the majority or minority of the House, and that every dollar you consent to appropriate out of the public Treasury that is not imperatively demanded by the public necessity is money appropriated for the purpose of dishonesty, fraud, and corruption.

Mr. Speaker, I have uttered that sentiment a hundred times, and I have never uttered any sentiment of the truth of which I was more conscious. Every dollar you appropriate beyond the absolute necessities of the Government, every dollar not demanded by a severely economical administration of the Government, every dollar appropriated not absolutely necessary for the purpose of the Government, is nothing more or less than a corruption fund. And, sir, in my judgment you can only preserve the purity of this Government by reducing expenditures down to the lowest point imperatively demanded by the public interest. A plain, frugal, simple, honest government can alone be permanently a republic.

What folly and madness, then, to go on with this reckless system of appropriation? Talk about committees of investigation! Can gentlemen expect to sit here in their seats and see millions upon millions of dollars unnecessarily appropriated and not expect corrupt and dishonest practices to grow out of it? Corruption is the inevitable and bitter fruit of extravagant appropriation; you cannot appropriate these millions unnecessarily without such results. Your committees of investigation will bring to the public eye scenes of dishonor causing the nation to blush. And yet when the appropriations were made, were not dishonesty and corruption inevitable? Were not the scenes now being exposed in this District as certain when you made the appropriations as they are to-day?

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. I and my friends on this side of the House agree with the gentleman from Indiana in reference to this amendment, but I wish to ask him whether he did not vote the other day to suspend the rules to appropriate four and a half million dollars without any debate—cutting off all debate and all chance of amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois has mentioned that, and I will take a moment to reply to it. The morning of the day the river and harbor appropriation bill, to which my friend refers, came before the House, appropriating four and a half million dollars for river and harbor improvements, including large appropriations imperatively demanded in my friend's section of the Union—on that very morning a gentleman brought forward a proposition here appropriating $10,000——

Mr. EDEN. Let me ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Excuse me until I answer the first question. Appropriating $10,000 for the purpose of improving the navigation of some river in the Southwest; and it was passed, although the river was known to geographers only, without a word of explanation, without a single line of recommendation from the Engineer Corps, without any estimates. On the mere reading of the bill, brought forward by a single member of the House, not sanctioned by any committee of the House, the rules were suspended by a two-thirds vote and the bill passed under these circumstances, to the astonishment of many gentlemen, certainly to myself. Then the rules were suspended, the bill passed, and that money appropriated out of the Treasury; not a word of explanation, no committee, no engineer's report, no estimate. I do not know whether my friend from Illinois voted for that most extraordinary measure or not.

Mr. EDEN. I voted against the whole thing.

Mr. RANDALL. And why did you not vote against the whole thing?

Mr. HOLMAN. When the proposition was brought forward to suspend the rules to pass this river and harbor appropriation bill, which had been in progress of preparation by the Committee on Commerce, of which I had the honor to be a member; when it had gone to the Committee on Appropriations and had been carefully examined and was found by that committee to be as moderate as the public service would admit of, then, knowing by the example to which I have called the attention of my friend from Illinois, leaving that bill open to amendment would almost certainly add many hundreds of thousands to the bill, I was only too glad of the opportunity to vote with the two-thirds of the House to suspend the rules and to put an end to the policy indicated by the bill just then passed, which appropriated $10,000 without estimate or recommendation for this river in the Southwest. I think my friend from Illinois is well answered, and that the House did well by almost a unanimous vote to pass the river and harbor bill, cutting down amendments. The bill was $1,500,000 less than the preceding year.

Mr. EDEN. Were there not a great many $10,000 appropriations for little rivers not known on the map in that river and harbor appropriation bill?

Mr. POTTER. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana whether it is not true that there never has been an instance in the House in which the river and harbor bill reported from the Committee on Commerce when left open to amendment in the House was diminished, and that on the contrary in every instance such legislation when left open to amendment has resulted in the appropriations being increased?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from New York knows that question is only to be answered in the affirmative. I know, as every gentleman in this House knows who has been in the habit of watching the progress of the river and harbor appropriation bills through the Committee on Commerce and who knows the pressure brought to bear on that committee, and who also knows the usual subsequent action in the House on the bill, and who wanted the appropriation reduced down to the lowest point consistent with the public interest, we ought gladly to seek the opportunity to cut off the millions which were ready on this floor to be piled up on the top of that bill and which only could be kept out under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. EDEN. Then would it not be better to pass this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. It has been stated that the course was adopted as a choice of evils, but I do not even take the excuse suggested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.] I say that as a measure of sound economy the passage of that bill through the House in the manner in which it was passed saved this Government $1,000,000, and my friend from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] certainly knows this to be a fact.

Mr. EDEN. Did not that bill contain a great many improper appropriations?

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill did not contain the usual number of improper appropriations.

Mr. EDEN. I differ with my friend in regard to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question is whether $1,000,000 was not saved. I believe there is not a gentleman familiar with the business of this House who does not know that $1,000,000 was saved by the action we took.

Mr. EDEN. I have been on this floor but a short time, and I am one of the gentlemen on this side of the House who have been lectured a good deal by my friend from Indiana for not opposing extravagant appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not lectured the gentleman or the House. I certainly know that I have no right to lecture my friend, and that his record is one that any member might well be proud of.

Mr. EDEN. But when I stood here opposing an appropriation of $4,500,000 without debate, and saw the great leader of economy was on the other side, I got a little demoralized on the question. I had been following my friend from Indiana very faithfully up to that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend will excuse me. I do not yield the floor.

Several MEMBERS. Go on! Go on!

Mr. HOLMAN. Let my friend take his own time in which to address the House if he thinks my answer is not a good one and that two-thirds of the House acted unwisely and that the Committee on Appropriations as well as the Committee on Commerce made a mistake. But let me ask him a question. Does the gentleman not know from the action taken by the House that very morning on the Georgia river bill that we could scarcely have avoided the putting of millions of dollars on the river and harbor bill if it had been opened to amendment?

Mr. EDEN. I know that if we had had a debate we would have tried to get rid of all the improper appropriations in that bill. And for my part I would not vote for a river and harbor bill which bore upon its face the character of being a log-rolling bill, even if I had been afraid that something else might get into it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did the gentleman not want to increase the appropriations in that bill?

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman wishes to shelter himself behind the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I repeat my question: Did the gentleman not want to add to the bill instead of taking from it?

Mr. EDEN. I did not want to make appropriations for those little rivers that many of us had never heard of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did you not want to increase the bill?

Mr. EDEN. I wanted appropriations for the great rivers, and not for those little streams that are not be found on the map.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that the gentleman wanted to increase the appropriations for the Mississippi and Illinois Rivers. I know that he wanted to put the appropriations for those rivers as high as they could be put. If we had not passed the bill as we did, we would have run a very great risk of appropriating vast sums of money by that bill and increasing its bulk beyond what was necessary or proper.

Mr. EDEN. My friend places me in a wrong position if he says that I wanted to increase the amount of the appropriation. I wanted to decrease it by striking out the items which the gentleman from Indiana himself admits to be improper.

Mr. HOLMAN. How did you want to increase it?

Mr. EDEN. I did not want to increase it at all. I wanted to diminish it, and you did not give me a chance to do what I wanted to do in the interest of economy. The gentleman from Indiana admits that there are in the bill a great many improper appropriations, and shelters himself behind the committee. In regard to the present proposition this matter has been considered by the committee, and if my friend from Indiana was correct in his course on the river and harbor bill, he should have gone to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and asked him to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill, for fear the House would add to the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken in this one respect, that I do not shelter myself behind the action of the Committee on Commerce. On the contrary, I acted as a member of that committee, and under my responsibility as one of its members for the bill, and taking my full share of responsibility for the measure.

My friend will not controvert the fact—no one can controvert the fact—that if that bill had been open to amendment many additional appropriations would have been put upon it. It may have contained appropriations that are questionable. I never heard of one passed by Congress that did not contain appropriations that might have been dispensed with. I do not say that that bill did contain any appropriations that could be dispensed with, because I knew the appropriations were all right and proper. But my friend cannot deny the fact that if the bill had been left open to amendment there would have been added to it, judging from the temper of the House and the number of gentlemen who had propositions for appropriations, at least $1,000,000, so as to make the amount appropriated by the bill five or five and a half million dollars instead of $4,500,000.

Did my friend ever know the House to strike out an item from a river and harbor bill?

Mr. EDEN. My friend from Indiana would not give us an opportunity to try and do so in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must press my question. I ask my friend from Illinois whether, during the time he has served in Congress, he ever knew an item to be stricken out of a river and harbor bill?

Mr. EDEN. My friend does not answer my question.

Mr. HOLMAN. No; but I ask you a question.

Mr. EDEN. I will answer my friend by saying that the House had no opportunity of striking out any items in this instance.

Mr. HOLMAN. No item ever was stricken out of such a bill.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be very brief.

Mr. GARFIELD. Be brief, and do not bother him long.

Mr. HOLMAN. O, it will not bother me at all.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman asks the gentleman from Illinois if he ever knew an appropriation to be stricken out of a river and harbor bill. Now, that question is so pertinent to me that I must refer to one case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, what case was it?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman remembers when he put into the river and harbor bill an appropriation of $1,250,000, to pay an old indebtedness on the Louisville and Portland Canal, close to the State of Indiana and the gentleman's own district.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not in my district.

Mr. CONGER. Well, that work has been the gentleman's special nursling.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; I have no objection to the gentleman's stating that.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee on Commerce and the House did strike that out. It was the largest appropriation that was ever put into a river and harbor bill, to pay an old debt. Why was it not stricken out?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman said that the House did strike it out.

Mr. CONGER. Why was it not stricken out? Because the gentleman from Indiana, although he lectures this House by the hour and by the month on every little paltry appropriation or increase of appropriation——

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that a question?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman stood here and fought against the striking out of that item by talking individually with members on this floor and everywhere else, and the gentleman succeeded in keeping in the bill the biggest appropriation ever made for such a purpose, because it was for a purpose near his district. The economy of the gentleman does not extend to his own region. He worked then to secure an appropriation of $1,250,000, but when it comes to a question of an appropriation for a purpose remote from his district, then he is the greatest economist in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken in one respect, and only one. The Louisville and Portland Canal is not within one hundred and fifty miles of my district. But that does not make any difference. The gentleman would confine all appropriations for these purposes to the lake shore, in which he is interested himself. Appropriations of millions have been made for the Atlantic coast and for the lake shore, while the great inland country, the Mississippi and the Ohio, those magnificent streams, had for long years been without any appropriation of public money at all; but my friend's lake shore had been almost lined with gold year after year. When the proposition was brought forward to do a little justice to the great inland section of the country my friend opposed it. All that I asked was that a small appropriation should be made to remove the obstruction in the way of the commerce of that section of the country.

I yield now what time I have left to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] makes the point or order that this debate is proceeding under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COX. I want only five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be under the necessity of giving the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads their time and let this bill go over.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the only amendment upon which there is a necessity to take a vote, as this is the only remaining amendment of the Senate which we recommend shall be concurred in. In regard to all the other amendments we recommend non-concurrence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for five minutes, and then recognize the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. COX. Whatever may be the disposition and complexion of this House, either of the minority or the majority, one thing is certain, and that is that my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] in his earnest and vigilant efforts for reform and economy, has with him the great body of the American people. He prophesies rightly when he says that there will be in the next Congress an opposition of a different kind and caliber from that which is now in this House. Gentlemen on both sides undertook to demoralize the gentleman from Indiana by their innuendoes and questions in regard to certain little votes which he has now and then made in relation to appropriations, and as to which they take exception. I would rather be with an angel, even if he slipped occasionally, than with a herd of incarnate devils who are always bad.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, were so harassed by my friend's charges that they undertook to speak, both at once, in reply to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] They were not successful; nor would they have been had they spoken one at a time.

Mr. KELLOGG. And the gentleman from Indiana has been allowed twice as much time as those gentlemen had.

Mr. DAWES. I have not interrupted the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. FORT. What politics is there in the house of this fire-engine company?

Mr. COX. The gentleman questions me as if he was a captain of a fire-engine. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who I see has just gone to the Speaker, perhaps to get another hour in which to reply to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] has reported to us the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, proposing to increase salaries in the State Department, and other bills proposing to increase salaries in the Treasury Department, and various other salaries. Scarcely any of his bills, if analyzed, show reductions. What has been the result of his large expressions? What committee has shown retrenchment? Now, sir,

> "Though the mills of the gods grind slowly,
> Yet they grind exceeding small;"
> But the mills of your committees
> Do not grind at all.

My friend from Indiana can well afford to be laughed at. I am laughed at myself for endeavoring to save. Let those laugh who win in the last resort. There is not a single item of our appropriation bills that my friend [Mr. HOLMAN] has not studied most carefully. There is not a man in this House who does not know he is our most useful member.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my friend will confine his remarks to the question before the House.

Mr. COX. Sir, I will stand by my friend in every emergency. I would rather be wrong with him than right with many of you on the other side. But I rose only for the purpose of calling attention to one fact; and that is, that after all our hurry-skurry action and speaking here this year, with a deficient Treasury, with paralyzed industries, the people on all hands demanding economy, there has been no practical economy shown by your committees. If I have the opportunity before we adjourn, I will take time to go over the appropriation bills. I will demonstrate wherein we have increased the expenses of this Government. I will endeavor to unravel our peculiar system of economy. You were so much in favor of economy that you solemnly appointed a committee on reform in the civil service. What did that committee do? What did it do the other day? They voted against appropriating $25,000 to continue this useless and hypocritical civil-service reform, thereby acknowledging that you had failed in that respect. In spite of your Philadelphia platform in favor of economy and civil-service reform you are dead failures, and the people know it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. A few words, and then I will call the previous question. The simple proposition upon which we are called to vote, and out of which all this eloquence has come, is this: Our very dissolute and corrupt fathers thought it necessary to have an engine near by the Capitol for the protection of the Capitol and other public buildings. They built an engine-house and provided an engine for use in case of a fire. In enlarging the grounds about the Capitol it became necessary to pull down the old, tottering engine-house. And it is proposed now to appropriate $18,000 to purchase a lot of ground on which to build another engine-house, and out of that plain, common business proposition has arisen this fearful tirade about the affairs of the country.

In one respect it has been very interesting, for my friend from Indiana reminds me very forcibly of Casabianca:

> The boy stood on the burning deck,
> Whence all but him had fled;
> The flame that lit the battle's wreck
> Shone round him o'er the dead.

He seems to be, like the heroes of Milton—

> ————faithful found;
> Among the faithless faithful only he.

The "corrupt republican party" of course vote against his views; and at last his own "beloved young democracy," as he calls it, that have all the dew of youth, the fresh virtue, the brightness of hope for the country in their possession, have so fallen away from him that but six of them voted with him a moment ago against one hundred and thirty-nine who voted against him in favor of paying our reporters $5,000 a year each.

And to all his abilities in other respects he now adds the gift of prophecy, and warns us that we are all going to the dogs; that all the seats on this side of the House will be vacated in the next Congress by the present members; and this morning he has learned that there is not virtue enough on his side of the House to save but six besides himself of the hundred that are now there; that all the rest will be sure to go. Why, sir, if these things which he has gone over be done in the "green tree" of the democracy, what will be done in the dry? The complimentary lecture which the gentleman has delivered to all the noble men around him, warning them that they must vacate their places here because only six of them voted with him, is one of the remarkable signs of the leadership of economy on the other side. I call for a vote.

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment of the Senate with the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, it was concurred in; there being—ayes 106, noes 27.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that a conference be asked with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to reconsider the various votes upon the Senate amendments and also the vote just taken, and move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House one hour to-day has been assigned to the Committee on Mississippi Levees. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] calls up the bill (H. R. No. 2988) to provide for the appointment of a commission of engineers to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, when this matter was last under consideration, about six weeks ago, I had the floor. I understand that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] desires that the previous question may be considered as ordered, but consents that before it is done I shall offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] a member of the committee. With these two amendments pending, the Chair hears no objection to seconding the previous question and ordering the main question. The amendment of the gentleman from Vermont will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to establish a board, to consist of two or more officers of the Corps of Engineers of the Army of the United States, whose duty it shall be to make such examinations and surveys, in addition to those already made by officers of the Army, of the delta of the Mississippi River as may be necessary to enable said board to report to the President as to the best method for the permanent reclamation and redemption of said alluvial basin from inundation; and the President shall transmit said report to Congress at the session next after the report is made to him.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered differs from the bill in this particular mainly: while the bill provides that the President shall be directed to assign two officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army and to appoint three civil engineers eminent in their profession for the purpose of making this survey, the substitute which I have submitted strikes out all relating to civil engineers and provides that the President shall appoint a board, to consist of two or more officers of the Corps of Engineers, for the purpose of making this examination and survey. This is the main difference between my substitute and the original proposition.

When this matter was before the House six weeks ago, I then stated that as it seemed to me this kind of appropriation was not warranted by the Constitution. The House will probably remember that the original bill was introduced with a lengthy preamble reciting that this reclamation of the basin of the Mississippi from inundation and overflow was a work that should be undertaken by the Government of the United States; that a work so extensive in its character must be called a national work and should be undertaken at the cost of the whole people of the United States. Before that proposition is assented to (and I suppose that the substitute which I have offered does not imply assent to that proposition) it is worth while for the House to consider something of the character of this work, its magnitude, and what it is expected to accomplish.

This is not the first time that the subject of the Mississippi levees has been before Congress. As far back as 1850 Congress appropriated all the swamp lands then belonging to the Government in Louisiana, Arkansas, and the other States along the Mississippi River to the States in which they were situated, for the purpose of improving the levees of the Mississippi River; and I find by a report which I have here that for some years at least the State of Louisiana had an income from the sale of those swamp lands amounting to $700,000 annually, a part or the whole of which was appropriated or used by that State under the direction of its levee commissioners for the purpose of maintaining levees in that State. But it has been urged that the levee system of one State does not protect that State unless the State north of it has also a system for the same purpose; that thus the expenditures of any one State for this object may sometimes be in great part ineffectual. In view of this the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] in a question which he put to me during my remarks on the day on which this question was last before the House, intimated, as I understood him, that, although he was not prepared to assent to the doctrine that this work should be undertaken by the General Government, the examination and surveys should be made by the Government because under the Constitution two or more States cannot enter into an agreement except by consent of Congress. Therefore he argued that we should get through Government examinations information on this subject in order to determine whether we would give our consent that the States along the Mississippi River might enter into an agreement by which they would at their joint expense maintain this levee system.

I do not think, however, that it will be seriously urged here that a survey is needed for any such purpose, for no one doubts for a single moment if such consent of Congress were necessary for an agreement between the States for the purpose of maintaining a levee system, but that it would be given at once. In other words, Congress would never put any obstacle in the way of the States along the Mississippi River entering into any agreement among themselves which they might determine or desire to enter into to reclaim the swamp lands now submerged at every period of high water in the Mississippi River.

It is noticeable in the first instance that such a survey as is contemplated by this bill has been already made, and made patiently and fully. In fact, after an examination of the documents which have been submitted from time to time to Congress, I am unable to see why there is any necessity of a new examination of the subject unless it be for the purpose of ascertaining what would be the present cost of performing this work. I hold in my hand a volume of two hundred and fourteen pages, and this is only a fragment of the whole work, which is entitled:

Report upon the physics and hydraulics of the Mississippi River; upon the protection of the alluvial region against overflow; and upon the deepening of the mouths, based upon surveys and investigations made under the acts of Congress directing the topographical and hydrographical survey of the delta of the Mississippi River, with such investigations as might lead to determine the most practicable plan for securing it from inundation, and the best mode of deepening the channels at the mouths of the river.

This was made after an exhaustive survey, occupying several years, and carefully prepared by these engineers, and after they had, in one way or another, made themselves acquainted with the working of levee systems and other systems for like purposes in Europe. It is an exhaustive discussion of the subject in all its phases, and I can hardly imagine how a new survey can bring to the attention of Congress any fact which would be of value to us in deciding the questions discussed in this volume, unless it may be facts showing what the present cost would be of works of this character. For this reason, in the substitute I have offered, I have provided that this board or corps of engineers which may be detailed for this purpose shall only make such surveys as may be necessary in addition to those already made, in order to make a report to Congress of the most practicable method of reclaiming the inundated lands along the Mississippi River.

After this survey was made and before the Chief of Engineers made his report, there was made a careful and detailed estimate and statement of the cost of the proposed levee system. The board decided that the levee system was the only practicable method of reclaiming the swamp lands. They gave a detailed estimate in the report sent to the House in 1869. That estimate fixes the cost of the proposed work at $36,230,000, and in other reports it has been put in round numbers at $40,000,000. This estimate covers the cost of a permanent system of levees along the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf.

What is to be gained by this system? It is stated very effectively in the report made from the committee by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. MOREY,] who has this bill in charge, and who gives in detail the amount of lands to be reclaimed and their enhanced value, in order to prove that the work is national in character because of the magnitude of the result in pecuniary value which may be attained by establishing and maintaining this levee system. I will call attention to some extracts from his report. He says:

The portion of the delta within the State of Louisiana is very large as compared with that of any of her sister States. It may be estimated at about 19,315 square miles, or nearly one-half of the whole delta of the Mississippi River proper. This State has a total area of 47,024 square miles, showing more than two-fifths of the State to be within the Mississippi alluvion. And though its water-spaces (lakes not being included in the above result) may amount to one-tenth of the whole area embraced, they are so valuable to men's uses as to be legitimately computed as acres in our approximation of the value of the lands whose reclamation is the object of our present enterprise.

It is worth observing in passing that this is in the State of Louisiana, and that the General Government does not own one acre of public lands to be improved by this contemplated work, but all these lands are now the property of private owners, to whom they have been transferred by the Government or by the State of Louisiana since the swamp lands were given to that State, or are to-day the property of Louisiana. Two-fifths of the State of Louisiana are to be benefited and reclaimed by this system of levees.

The report then goes on to say:

Computing, then, six hundred and forty acres for every square mile of the delta, we find it to amount to 26,363,520 acres of land, of which the State of Louisiana has no less than 13,315,000 acres lying beneath the level of our great high waters. Levees only protect them now very inadequately from frequent submersion by the great delta sea.

What value shall we impute to these acres of more than Egyptian fertility?

Then a computation is entered into to show what the value of the lands to be claimed would be, and it is stated here in the aggregate as amounting to more than $300,000,000. In other words, private property in the State of Louisiana would be increased in value to the extent of more than $300,000,000 if this work were accomplished. The value of all the lands to be reclaimed, after a perfect system of levees is established, along the river from Cairo to the Gulf is estimated by the committee at over $700,000,000!

Now, sir, I would ask the House in all seriousness, when a proposition comes in here to improve the property of a State or the property of private individuals to this extent or to any extent, is it a work for Congress to undertake? I can see how, under the provisions of the Constitution respecting commerce, Congress has the constitutional power to make the Fort Saint Philip Canal or improve the mouth of the Mississippi by the jetty system, or even to construct canals connecting navigable waters. But that you can extend or construe any provision of the Constitution into an authority in Congress to improve private property at the expense of the whole people of the United States I am wholly unable to understand. What benefit, Mr. Speaker, is the State of Illinois to get from this $300,000,000 additional value that is to be given to the State of Louisiana by this improvement? What benefit does Minnesota get? What benefit does New York get? What benefit does New England get? What benefit, in a word, does any section of the country get, except as far as we are all benefited by each other's prosperity? None whatever. The extent of cotton-growing land would be increased to a large amount undoubtedly by an improvement of this sort; but when it is increased, it is the property of the State of Louisiana or of the State of Arkansas or of other States bordering on the Mississippi River, or the property of private individuals in those States. It is not the property of the United States, and we derive no benefit from it whatever.

In several reports made on former occasions to Congress in respect to the value of these improvements it is put up into the hundreds of millions. Now, sir, if any State can see where, by an expenditure of ten, fifteen, or forty million dollars, it can improve the value of property within that State to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars, I can find a reason why the State may engage in that undertaking, but I cannot see why the Government of the United States should be called upon to enter upon any such work.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is considered as old-fashioned, and sometimes I am afraid it is considered disloyal, to call the attention of this House to the Constitution of the United States. We are told here sometimes that we have practically outgrown the Constitution of the United States; that by some transformation growing out of the war, or in some other way, there has been such a new birth to this country that the old Constitution is no longer our rule of conduct, that it is no longer a restraint upon and no longer a measure of the powers of Congress, that we are only to consider what we want to do, and then if we can get a majority let us do it. But, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet seen promise that out of any of these new doctrines any good is likely to come to the Republic in its future, or that by any disregard of the foundations upon which it was built or the safe and prudent provisions by which its powers were separated and defined and its authority limited and hedged about, and by means of which it has come to be the great and magnificent government which it is to-day, there can be hope for a higher prosperity, a broader freedom, or a grander development than is to be found in the path defined by the Constitution as it is written and stands to-day.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that under the Constitution there are certain things for which Congress may appropriate money, and certain things for which it may raise taxes. These are specified in the first paragraph of section 8 of the first article of the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power—

And it gets no other grant of power except the grant given it here and in other paragraphs of this same Constitution—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the grant of the power. There is the measure of the power, and the whole of it; and how upon that can such a proposition as that of the preamble of this bill find support? I read it again:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Mr. COTTON. Will the gentleman tell us what the general welfare of the United States embraces, and then we will see how far we can go?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman from Iowa asks me what the general welfare includes. I know that in these latter-day interpretations it includes everything. If the gentleman from Iowa has a farm containing one hundred or one thousand acres, I suppose the people of his immediate vicinity, the people of the county in which he resides would be benefited somewhat by anything that would increase materially his prosperity or the value of his farm, and, Mr. Speaker, what increases the wealth or material prosperity of any single State in this Union is to some extent doubtless an addition to the general prosperity of the whole country. We do not live for ourselves alone, and one State does not live for itself alone, and cannot exclude anybody outside of its limits from a share, partial though it may be, in its prosperity. But I do not understand because there would be some general good result to the community in which the gentleman lives, from an increase in the value of his farm to the extent of $100,000, that therefore the county in which he resides or the State in which he resides would have any warrant whatever, even with the most liberal interpretation of the general welfare, to allow him to collect taxes from all parts of that State for the purpose of benefiting his private property. And no more do I suppose because the State of Louisiana will have its material prosperity wonderfully enhanced, and every acre of land within that State multiplied by ten in its value, by reason of such improvement as this bill contemplates, that therefore we can say that the general welfare of the United States is thus so far increased that we should adopt this measure for the purpose of so improving, so benefiting, and so enlarging the welfare of the State of Louisiana that we may tax the whole people of the United States to the extent of $40,000,000 that the land-owners of the valley of the Mississippi River may add $700,000,000 to the value of their private property.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman this question; if, for instance, the entire sugar lands of this country and that would embrace all the lands at the mouth of the Mississippi River were submerged, and could not be reclaimed, would not that be a public calamity? Is it not for the public benefit that they should be preserved from overflow?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. O, you cannot give it any such interpretation as that, even in its broadest sense. I agree, as a matter of course, that such a calamity would raise the price of sugar to the consumers throughout the United States. I agree that that might be so; but that would no more give the United States the power to interfere to cheapen the price of sugar, than the high price of wheat could be made an argument for taking money from the Treasury for the purpose of bringing immigrants into this country and locating them on the grain-growing lands of the West in order that the products of grain might be increased so that every one could buy his wheat for half the price for which he could get it before. That would undoubtedly be a benefit to those who consume the products of the West; but there can be no such broad interpretation of the words "general welfare" as to bring any such appropriations within the clear understanding of the meaning of the term. Supply and demand take care of that. The General Government cannot undertake to be a producer in order to cheapen prices, or pay a part of the cost of production by taxation in order that the purchaser may have his commodity at cheaper rates.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will not consume time that other gentlemen desire to occupy. I only call attention to this phase of the question, not so much for the purpose of antagonizing this bill as to say here that the project to which this bill looks in its ultimate results is one which seems to me to be dangerous and without warrant either in precedent or in the Constitution. Yet, sir, it may be said if we are to appropriate money as has been done during this Congress every time the Mississippi overflows its banks, if we are to authorize the Army to issue rations to feed every person living within the ravages of its flood, if we are to support the inhabitants along its banks until the next harvest, we may as well undertake the work of establishing these levees. But that was not given of right; it was bestowed as a charity. When we meet a case of instant and great need, when thousands and tens of thousands of people are starving we may allow the Government to afford aid and relief just as an individual would do it at such a time and would answer any call made upon him, not recognizing that there is any right to make such call but moved by his own generosity to answer it. The Government might do that; but they could not do it, and I venture to say that it was not done in the recent instance, under any power given to Congress by the Constitution, but only because every man's sympathies answered to the appeal made and we supposed that our constituents would fully justify us in doing what every man felt to be the command of a generous impulse; but we did not thereby sanction an expenditure for the improvement of private property along the river's banks.

But, sir, I have watched I confess with some alarm—not perhaps well-grounded alarm, but with some alarm—what has seemed to me to be the growing inclination of Congress—not confined to the republican side of the House, for I do not see that the infection has caught less extensively on the democratic side than on the republican side—the growing disposition of Congress to put all charges of magnitude for anything that is supposed to improve the business or increase the prosperity of a locality upon the Treasury of the United States, as though in that way by some trick of finance we got rid of paying it. Now, sir, everybody knows that when we get round to the end of the circle, if I may use the expression, when we get round to the starting point in this circle, we shall not relieve anybody. Taxes will be multiplied, and the people of all sections of the country will be obliged to pay those taxes. I venture to say that the complaints which come up to us from the West and the Southwest and from the manufacturing towns and cities of the East would be lessened by relieving them of taxation; and in fact the best legislation that we can adopt here to lessen those complaints and to answer those cries for help is to relieve them of taxation. Certainly it is not the best way to make a great soup-dish of the Treasury of the United States and put into every man's hands in the United States a ladle and allow him to help himself to the soup which Congress kindly furnishes to feed the whole people of the country. That is not a measure of relief. The true measure of relief is to reduce at all points the expenditures; to reduce at all points taxation; to bring down the expenses of this Government to an economical and honest administration of public affairs, and to lift from the people burdens which are unauthorized and unwarranted, and which our extravagant expenditures have cast upon them. When we do that we shall lift from them the burden that is now oppressing them, and their own energy, the energy of a free people, will be sufficient to accomplish the rest of the work. If we can lessen taxation we shall have done all that Congress, in my judgment, can fairly do to relieve the burdens under which the people now groan. But when we undertake works of special and local interest like this, which in the end looks to an expenditure of forty or fifty million dollars, we are not lessening but are increasing the burdens which are to be borne by the people themselves in that region supposed to be benefited as well as by the people in other parts of the country, and adding to the oppressions against which the people are crying out.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman if it is not just as proper to aid this section of the country in this way as it is to aid New England manufacturers?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I think it is just as proper to do this as it would be to pay a subsidy out of the Treasury to the manufacturers of New England.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not speak of subsidies.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let me tell the gentleman that if he will relieve the manufactures of New England from taxes, from the burden that is cast upon them by the great debt and its annual burden of interest, the manufacturers of New England will be able to take care of themselves. They ask no favors of the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. They have always asked them.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Except that taxes shall not be piled up so that the cost of everything which enters into the support of a family is increased, until laborers are compelled to strike for an increase of wages, and it is thus made impossible for manufacturers to carry forward their industries with any profit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SYPHER. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks I am about to offer upon the pending bill, I desire to impress upon the House and the country the magnitude and importance of this question of the Mississippi levees, and of the necessity for sure protection from inundation of the vast areas of fertile lands comprising the Mississippi Delta. Your select committee, to whom was referred this subject, in their able report have presented an array of facts which must dispel all doubt as to the power and duty of Congress in this matter. A great necessity and responsibility is upon you at this moment. While I speak the lives and property of the people inhabiting the Mississippi Valley are being destroyed by the turbulent waters of that overpowering and uncontrolled stream.

No power outside of the General Government is adequate to protect the wide expanse of fertile territory, and give confidence to capital and labor to occupy and cultivate it. Individuals, corporations, and States all have hitherto attempted in vain to confine the waters of the Mississippi within its banks. Millions of treasure have been expended in these fruitless efforts until the States are impoverished and the people are bankrupt. A crisis is upon us; an unprecedented flood now rolls in unchecked and devastating might over the land, leaving suffering, death, and destruction wide-spread in the wake of its resistless currents. I desire here, in the name of my afflicted State, to acknowledge with profound gratitude the liberality and generosity of those citizens of other States who have contributed so promptly for the relief of our suffering people. These individual acts of beneficence, together with the aid afforded by Congress in furnishing supplies, will alleviate immediate wants, but the millions of property swept away before the flood can only be replaced by labor and the lapse of time. It is in behalf of the inhabitants of the whole delta, citizens of five great States, that I plead for the aid of the Government. It is for them I invoke the aid of the strong arm of national authority, that the periodical recurrence of these appalling disasters may be averted.

The history of levee protection on the Mississippi River dates from the earliest settlements on its banks. As the country adjacent to the river became inhabited, the levee system was established and extended until it stretched for more than one thousand miles along both sides of the channel. Prior to 1860 the system was maintained by the riparian proprietors with the large force of slave labor at their command. Congress, in 1849, ceded vast tracts of swamp lands to the States interested in aid of this purpose. Under that system and aid the levees attained a high degree of perfection, and afforded ample protection to the valuable crops grown in the soil thus defended against the floods. That condition of security continued until the war, no less disastrous than the devouring floods, swept away and destroyed both levees, and the disciplined labor by means of which the system had been constructed and maintained; a system which had cost the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Missouri $40,000,000.

Owing to the great change in the industrial and domestic relations of the Southern States, though the great body of the newly made citizens remain upon these lands and are interested in their protection, they cannot be controlled and employed in large numbers as they were under the old régime. The great plantations are, in many cases, divided up into small homesteads, and this process is destined to continue. Hence the organized force and capital which once enabled individuals to construct and maintain levees cannot hereafter be a reliance.

Since the war there has been no united action by the States whose alluvial lands are subject to overflow. Louisiana, in efforts to reconstruct her own levees, has expended more than $8,000,000. Being powerless to make any further efforts, she appeals to you in the name of millions of your own countrymen inhabiting the Mississippi Valley for protection against inundation.

The value of the products of these lands in 1860 exceeded the sum of $150,000,000. With adequate protection from overflow, 55 per cent., the same as in the State of Illinois, being under cultivation, would produce a crop exceeding $500,000,000 in value.

Of the extent of this vast expanse of territory I quote from the able report of your Committee on Mississippi Levees, as follows:

> The delta of the Mississippi, with its head near Cape Girardeau, in Missouri, sweeps across nine and a half degrees, from 37° 30′ to 29° of north latitude, and contains about 38,706 square miles of area, while the Red River contains in her alluvium about 1,887 miles, and the Arkansas about 500 miles, liable to inundation unless protected by levees. Thus we find the aggregate alluvial area of the Mississippi and connate alluvions, dependent upon levees for protection against inundation, about 41,193 square miles.

In round numbers, the delta requiring protection levees comprises twenty-six million acres, divided about equally between the cotton and sugar producing districts. The ordinary yield from one-half the cotton acreage would exceed five million bales, which at present prices would bring in the market $300,000,000. Would not that amount added to the credit side of our international balance-sheet relieve from embarrassment the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] whose constituents pay their proportion of the interest due foreign bondholders with the proceeds of butter and cheese?

When England discovered that her supply of American cotton would be cut off by the rebellion in this country, she at once began to encourage the cultivation of cotton in India. But the cotton-fields of Asia being distant from the sea-board required the construction of railroads at great expense. This was done without delay, but before a supply of India cotton reached the mills at Manchester the British government had expended $450,000,000. Will this Government hesitate in the face of this example to expend $40,000,000 for the protection of an area which is more valuable than the whole of India? But these vast expenditures by England in developing new cotton-fields have resulted in signal failures so far as it was intended to cause a diminution in the demand for American cottons of the best staple.

Prior to 1860 American cotton held supremacy in the markets of the world. Cotton was the "king" of American products. Then, if king under the baneful hinderances of slave labor, what may it not become under a free and intelligent system of agriculture? But lest his fleecy majesty offend the sensibilities of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] who watches with such jealous care the constitutional safeguards of his country, I pass to the more soothing and agreeable subject of sugar.

The annual consumption of sugar in this country averages about thirty-six pounds per capita, and upon the basis of forty millions of population the total consumption would equal seven hundred and twenty thousand tons, of which about six hundred thousand tons are imported from Cuba and other Spanish islands. Our people pay for this large quantity of imported sugar $75,000,000—their trade with Cuba is $15,000,000—leaving a balance of $60,000,000 against them, which must be paid in gold. Again, on the small trade American citizens have with Cuba they are taxed 80 per cent. duties. Witness as examples these articles: On corn, forty cents per bushel; on flour, eight dollars per barrel; on lard, three and a half cents per pound; on mules, nineteen dollars per head; on horses, fifty-five dollars per head.

Notwithstanding these discriminating and almost prohibitory duties, our Government continues the unprofitable policy of paying $60,000,000 in gold annually into the treasury of that insolent Spanish despotism for an article of prime necessity which our own citizens have the ability to produce abundantly upon American soil.

Let me examine this proposition still further. The sugar-producing area of Louisiana comprises upward of six million acres, one-third of which, properly cultivated, would produce a larger quantity of sugar than our entire population require for home consumption, at the rate of thirty-six pounds per capita. Therefore, simply as an economical proposition, I submit our Government should protect these valuable lands and foster the growth of domestic sugars; and as a moral question, this enlightened Republic cannot longer support with its gold, as its nearest neighbor, an effete slave power, the last example of that revolting relic of barbarism existing among civilized nations.

Let this Government profit by the example of France in excluding the sugars of the British colonies. That policy threatened for a time to deprive the French people of an article of prime necessity, and sugars became scarce and very high in price. But under the fostering influence of the French government the development of the growth and manufacture of beet-sugar speedily supplied the demand, and to-day more than a million acres devoted to beet culture, and hundreds of sugar-mills and refineries, producing cheap and excellent sugar in excess of the wants of the people, continue to attest the wisdom and sagacity of the act.

I propose more specifically to notice some remarks made on this bill by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] He seems to think this proposition is without precedent. He overlooks the grant of swamp lands in 1849 and 1850 to certain States for levee purposes, by which acts many of those lands were brought into market to the great benefit of the Treasury of the United States. He also overlooks the appropriation in 1850 of $50,000 "for a topographical and hydrographical survey of the delta of the Mississippi, with such investigations as may lead to determine the most practical plan for securing it from inundation;" and for a continuance of the same survey $50,000 additional, applied by the act of August 31, 1852, in furtherance of the same object. The nation at a period in its history when notions of strict constitutional construction prevailed was committed to this great public work by appropriations.

The gentleman does not seem to doubt the power of Congress to improve the Mississippi River as a great highway of commerce between the States. His objection is that the bill looks to the incidental improvement of the lands which may be reclaimed by keeping the waters of the Mississippi within its bounds. The distinction is quite too refined for practical minds to grasp. An enlarged and scientific system of leveeing would certainly greatly benefit navigation by keeping the waters within the channels which nature has marked out. I do not understand the proposition to embrace the old debatable ground of internal improvements of a national character. If it did, certainly the veto messages of Presidents Monroe and Jackson would be in favor of the power to do a work which extends through or bounds six States of the Union, and affects the commerce directly of at least one-half and indirectly of the whole Republic. The proposition if pushed to the extent which the gentleman proposes would undoubtedly come within the circumscribed limits of the strict constructionists. Nevertheless it received the powerful indorsement of John C. Calhoun, in the convention over which he presided at Memphis. In the view of that great man, the reclaiming of so vast and necessary a country was a national object in which the Federal Government might engage.

But it is no longer a question about reclaiming lands not cultivated; but it is, Will the nation suffer so vast a belt of sugar and cotton lands to be abandoned and given up to the floods? If this were to be done, the gentleman from Vermont would find the taxes of New England largely increased by the diminished crops of cotton and sugar; the diminished tonnage on the Mississippi River; the diminished demand for New England fabrics, and the diminished demand for coastwise shipping. I regret to see that any sectional feeling, not to say prejudice, is invoked upon the subject. The same argument could be employed against every harbor, river, and highway improvement in the nation. It would have applied emphatically to the railroads which bind the continent together from sea to sea; to all international subsidies; to every law for the protection of domestic industry, and to our laws for mail communications. Certain sections are more immediately benefited than others, but no sections are ever depressed that others may be enriched. And to no section have so few benefits been extended as to the agricultural interests of the South.

We extend, and always with my hearty approval, ample national protection to the agriculture of the West and North; to the woolgrowers of the prairies and mountains; to the lumbermen and fishermen on the northern borders, and to the manufacturers of the East; in all of which the gentleman from Vermont joins. We now ask, and with good reason, that the same ægis of power be extended over the suffering inhabitants of the valley of the Lower Mississippi.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. LEWIS.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, the question of the reclamation of the vast delta of the Mississippi is one of life and death, as it were, to a million or more of population living immediately on the lands directly exposed to the floods. It is a vital one to the citizens generally of six or seven great States, which extend into that region, while its direct and ultimate consequences deeply concern the interests and the prosperity of all the people of that immense area geographically designated as the valley of the Mississippi, embracing twenty-one States, and seven Territories soon to be States, and comprising more than 1,256,000 square miles of territory. It is of incalculable importance moreover to the whole nation, and merits the earnest and anxious consideration of the national Government, and especially of Congress. It greatly concerns the interests of my constituents, will affect their future prosperity immensely in many ways, and I therefore feel impelled by the strongest sense of duty to ask the attention of the House to some reasons why I think it should pass the bill now before it, providing for the appointment of a mixed commission of Army and civil engineers to investigate the whole question, and report some permanent and comprehensive plan for the reclamation and protection of the vast alluvial basin subject to overflow.

EXTENT OF THE DELTA.

The delta or alluvial lands of the Mississippi, according to Professor Forshey, an eminent civil engineer, who has devoted nearly thirty-eight years to the levees and physics of the Mississippi, comprises an area of 38,706 square miles, or 24,771,840 acres, of the most fertile soil on the globe. This is an extent of territory three times as large as the kingdom of the Netherlands, twice as large as Switzerland or Denmark, larger than many other famous historic states in Europe, and is more than equal to the combined areas of six distinguished States out of the original thirteen of our nation. I refer, of course, to Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Maryland, and Delaware. Its vast capabilities will be recognized at once, when it is remembered that with a soil fully as fertile as that of the valley of the Nile, it is seven times as great in area as all the arable lands of Egypt now or at any former period of its history.

ITS CAPACITY OF PRODUCTION.

In 1860 this very region, now unhappily submerged by the present disastrous floods, produced 688,254 bales of cotton, worth $41,295,240; and 460,000,000 pounds of sugar, worth $32,200,000. Humphreys and Abbot's survey estimates the yearly capacity of this region for cotton alone, at only ten cents per pound, to be equal to $315,000,000! At the prices that have prevailed since the war this would amount to about $500,000,000 annually! Add to this its capabilities for the production of sugar in the lower portion of the delta, or south of 31° 30′, and the total amount would be almost fabulous, and nearly equal to the value of the cereal crop of the whole United States. This vast delta region, besides the grain lands in its northern portion, contains at least ten million acres of the best cotton lands in the world and five million acres of the finest and richest sugar lands. These estimates of the delta do not include the alluvial lands of the tributaries of the Mississippi that are subject to overflow. They would greatly increase the area already mentioned.

ITS ENORMOUS NATURAL RESOURCES.

This region, thoroughly reclaimed, would soon produce for our country all the sugar it now consumes or can hereafter consume, and for which we now pay annually to other countries $60,000,000 in gold besides all the exports we send them, and would give us also a monopoly of cotton production for the world. If we intend ever to have the balance of trade with foreign countries in our favor, as we ought, and to become independent of them, commercially and financially, we must carefully encourage and protect the production of the great staples of the world's commerce and manufacture in the rich delta of the Mississippi. All that is required for the amplest development of its vast and almost boundless resources is secure protection from the devastating floods. They carry ruin and desolation and death where they go. The million of planters and laborers there must be protected from their ravages or must forever retire before them.

GREAT RESULTS ACHIEVED BY LEVEES.

Can this vast region be thoroughly protected? In the past levees have been almost exclusively relied on. Cut-offs and outlets have been sometimes suggested, and have been ably advocated by Cowdon and other writers of eminence and distinction, but have not received much favor, while thousands of miles of levees have been hopefully and confidingly constructed. They have sometimes failed to answer all the expectations of their builders, especially when unwisely located, but have done immense good and have certainly accomplished great results. They have reclaimed millions of acres of the richest lands in the world, and have added immensely to their value. In 1860 the farm lands and plantations of the great delta—which from Cairo to the Gulf is nearly six hundred miles long, and thirty to one hundred and twenty wide—were computed to be worth, for agricultural purposes alone, without levees, about nine and a half million dollars, but with levees $339,718,440. Levees had increased the agricultural value of the lands of the delta more than $330,000,000. Of course this does not include its numerous cities, towns, and villages, nor even the houses and other buildings on the farms and plantations. It was the mere naked value of the soil for the plow and the hoe.

EXTENT AND SIZE OF LEVEES.

At that time there were in the delta over two thousand miles of levees, with an average height of eight to ten feet and a breadth at base of fifty to seventy feet. Their width at top was usually equal to their height. A few of the levees were of immense size. That of the Yazoo Pass, about one hundred miles below Memphis, was cut by the Federal forces during the war at a point where it was thirty-eight feet high. For a distance of twelve hundred feet it was on an average twenty-eight feet high, and in places nearly three hundred feet broad at its base.

COST OF THE LEVEES IN THE PAST—THE FLOODS.

The national Government has done nothing as yet for the protection of the delta from the floods, except merely to make surveys, &c., and to donate the swamp lands to the States. Individual planters, towns, parishes, cities, counties, and States, the direct sufferers, have thus far borne the heavy burdens of building the levees, and have expended immense sums upon them. Louisiana, before the war of secession, had expended more than $24,000,000, Mississippi more than $14,000,000, Missouri over $1,640,000, and Arkansas more than $1,000,000; in all about $41,000,000. Since the war Louisiana has spent about $13,000,000, and Mississippi some $4,000,000, making thus far nearly $60,000,000 since 1830 or 1840 spent on levees. It is beyond the power of impoverished and desolated States to go further in this direction unaided. The work has grown beyond their resources.

THE PROBLEM OF THE FUTURE.

To-day, when hundreds of thousands of people are houseless and homeless—their all, excepting their land, swept away by the devouring flood; their cattle, their horses, and working animals drowned or starved; hunger and famine staring them in the face, the lives of all of them only saved by the rations sent them by a beneficent Government, and the supplies and funds contributed by the generous and charitable citizens of other sections of our common country—the question arises with thrilling interest, What can be done to save and protect this vast region? What hidden resources of science and engineering skill can be evoked? What reliable and comprehensive plans can be sought out and adopted, that in future shall rescue it from floods and desolation?

This is a mighty problem that challenges the most earnest attention of the patriot and the statesman. It demands anxious but deliberate thought, profound study, and, after all that, vigorous action. It cannot be ignored. It cannot longer be trifled with or evaded. It must and will have some solution. The question is, shall the vast delta, with all its enormous gifts of nature, with all its magnificent capabilities, be for countless ages to come the home of man or of the alligator? Shall it be the happy abode of millions of our people in the far-coming future, or shall it be abandoned to malaria and miasma, to waste and solitude and gloom? Shall this immense region be a living fountain of wealth to our country, the glowing Eden of production on the vastest scale of the great staples of the world's commerce, or shall it lie there wallowing in the ooze and floods for centuries, the eye-sore of the nation, the gloomy sepulcher of its hopes, its honor, and its statesmanship?

DIFFICULTIES—FIRST, AMOUNT OF WATER.

The difficulties to be overcome are confessedly very great, but by no means insurmountable. I will briefly mention a few of them. The first is the immense amount of the water. Ninety trillion cubic feet of rain-water fall, on an average, each year in the vast valley of the Mississippi. This is equal to a lake seven hundred and twenty miles long, one hundred miles wide, and fifty feet deep. Three-fourths of this immense quantity is absorbed by the earth, or disposed of by evaporation, &c., so that nineteen and a half trillions is the average amount carried to the Gulf by the great river. The quantity varies greatly, however. Sometimes, in a low-water year, it is only eleven trillion, while in one of very high floods it has risen to twenty-seven trillion cubic feet. The vast quantity of this "rushing inland sea" in itself constitutes a most formidable obstacle. Its discharge is larger than that of all the noted rivers of Europe combined, and is equaled by only two on the globe, being a little more than two-thirds that of the La Plata, and only something more than a quarter that of the Amazon.*

The enormous volume of water that comes rushing down the river with tremendous force in time of floods can never be realized by one who has not seen it.

The variability in the volume of water from season to season and from year to year is a great difficulty, for were the amount always the same it would be vastly easier to calculate for and provide the forces necessary to confine it within the bed of the river.

CURVES AND PECULIARITIES OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

The winding course of the river and the soft and yielding nature of its banks constitute another great difficulty. If the Mississippi ran straight and could remain so (which with its soft and friable banks it could not do) there would never be any overflow. It would only have half as far to go as now, and would run at least twice or thrice as fast. So it could easily carry off five or six times as much water as it now does. From the mouth of the Missouri to the Gulf on a

*The proportional quantity of water discharged by some of the principal rivers has been estimated as follows:

Thames	1	Indus	133
Rhine	13	Ganges	148
Loire	10	Yang-tse-Kiang	258
Po	6	Amour	166
Elbe	8	Lena	125
Vistula	12	Obi	179
Danube	65	Nile	250
Dnieper	36	Saint Lawrence	112
Don	38	Mississippi	338
Volga	80	Plata	490
Euphrates	60	Amazon	1,280

straight line is about 675 miles, with an average descent of about 8 inches to the mile, but the Mississippi winds and curves so much that it runs 1,300 miles in that distance, and thus reduces its average rate of descent to about 4 inches to the mile. Sometimes in running twenty-five miles round a bend it has not advanced forward a single mile. The traveler on a steamboat descending the river, and therefore of course going south, will often discover with surprise that for miles at a time he is going north. Half the time he is moving east or west. He becomes sadly bewildered, but tries to have faith that the river knows where it is going, and at least will not run up hill.

WIDTH OF RIVER—IT GROWS NARROWER.

It is a strange peculiarity of the wonderful river that as it proceeds downward in its course toward the Gulf, instead of growing wider as you would expect, it actually becomes much narrower. From the mouth of the Ohio, 1,080 miles above the passes, which are only a few miles above the Gulf, to the mouth of the Arkansas, 670 miles above them, the average width in time of high water is 4,470 feet, the depth 87. From there to the mouth of Red River, 300 miles from the passes, the width is 4,080 feet, the depth 96. From Red River down to Bayou La Fourche, which is 170 miles above them, the width is 3,000 feet, the depth 113. From there to the passes, or for the last 170 miles that the river flows in a single channel, the width is 2,470 feet, and the depth 129. It will be observed that as the river becomes narrower it grows deeper as a compensation. The reduction of its width, however, from 4,470 to 2,470 feet is very striking. It has actually lost 2,000 feet in width. I may mention that the river loses at least one-tenth of its mean width as the season of low water sets in. At such times its mean width from the mouth of Red River to Bayou La Fourche is 2,750 feet, and from there to the passes only 2,250.

RANGE OF DEPTH.

The rise and fall of the waters of the river, or the difference between the highest and lowest waters, is another and the greatest difficulty in controlling the Mississippi. At Cairo, and also at Natchez, 360 miles from the Gulf, it is 51 feet; at Memphis, 40; at mouth of Red River, 44; at Bayou La Fourche, 24; at New Orleans, nearly 15; at Fort Saint Philip, 4½; at the passes, where the river forks into several channels, only some 10 or 12 miles from the Gulf, it is about 2½ feet, and at the Gulf of course nothing.

VAST AMOUNT OF SEDIMENT.

The immense amount of mud and sediment suspended in the waters of the rivers, especially during the floods, is another difficulty. Able engineers have computed that it annually carries into the Gulf in suspension enough precious soil to form a solid mass 1 mile square and 241 feet high. Others think it carries far more. The best authorities estimate the weight of the sediment so carried at more than 406,000,000 tons. But besides this immense amount, it deposits vast quantities on its banks, and all over the country overflowed in time of floods. Rushing along at such times at the rate of 6 miles an hour, and in the middle of its current on the surface more than 7, its madly whirling waters are loaded with sediment. But as soon as the waters pour over its banks they begin to move much more slowly, and drop a large portion of their solid matter at once on or near the banks, and thence in diminishing quantities for miles, till they reach the swamps. In this way it comes to be a fact that the land, as you go back from the river, slopes downward for miles. The banks become in time much higher than the land farther back, the slope in the first mile being from 3 to 12 feet, and on an average fully 7. Hence the river runs, as it were, in the center of a vast ridge a few miles wide and as long as the river's course. In time of highest waters it rises as high as the top of this great ridge and higher, but the mass of its waters remains in its bed, which is from 100 to 150 feet deep.

UNDERMINING AND FALLING IN OF ITS BANKS.

But the undermining and constant caving in of its banks is the great and enormous trouble in regard to the Mississippi. Deep down below the 20 or 30 feet of surface soil deposited at some time by the river are vast beds of clay; beneath them are immense layers of sand, often 60 or 80 or even 100 feet below the top of the banks. The two, however, are often strangely intermixed and interspersed the one with the other. The current of the river washes out the sand, and the banks, thus left without support, sooner or later give way and tumble into the waters, which speedily transport them elsewhere in the form of sediment, or oftener roll, and push, and whirl them along for a mile or two, or less, until they aid to form sand-bars or islands or new banks lower down. Niagara River works its way during the slow centuries in a somewhat similar manner up towards Lake Erie; only there it is an under stratum of soft rock of shale instead of sand, a hundred feet beneath the bed of the river, that by degrees is washed away and leaves the hard superincumbent rocks to fall by their own weight.

TOWNS WASHED AWAY.

Whenever the current is deflected toward either bank, as often occurs and always in concave bends, the bank assailed, if of soft and yielding material, as sand or loam, is washed away like snow-banks before an April sun. Houses, cultivated lands, farms, forests, and sometimes towns, are swallowed up! The famous village of Napoleon, Arkansas, so noted in former days, has thus been swept away. Waterproof, once a flourishing town 400 miles up the river, has been entirely washed away since 1850, but has been rebuilt nearly a mile farther back, and therefore on much lower ground, but is again menaced with destruction. In its former location it only required a levee 2 or 3 feet high, because being then on the old bank it was on higher land than it is now. To-day it is in peril behind a levee 9 feet high!

AS BANKS FALL IN, LEVEES RISE HIGHER.

When the banks give way far enough back to reach the levees, they fall in of course, and their successors have to be built much higher (because on lower ground farther back) and wider in proportion, costing vastly more. If, for instance, the new levee be built on land 10 feet lower than the former one was, it must be raised to a greater height by 10 feet, and will be at least 70 feet broader at its base; for the higher a levee rises the greater must be its foundation and its cross-section throughout. The solid contents of levees are, in fact, in strict proportion to the squares of their height. Men have seen in certain localities, in a single life-time, three or four levees thus built one after the other; each succeeding one necessarily twice as high and four times as large as its predecessor. This process cannot go on always. Something better than such a system is badly needed.

NEED OF CENTRAL POWER TO LOCATE LEVEES, ETC.

The injudicious location of levees often exposes them to destruction. Planters living near the river insist on their being built in front of their improvements, to protect them at all events, and thus they are often placed too near the crumbling bank. A great central power, like the national Government, is needed with absolute authority to determine where the levees shall be located and how they shall be built to make them secure and lasting. But place them where you will, if only where they are needed, you may be almost certain if you continue to rely upon levees alone that at some future time they will be dragged into the terrible river and ingulfed beneath its waves.

CUT-OFFS.

In cases where the river has for ages perhaps cut away the bank on one side, making a bend of twenty or thirty miles shaped like an enormous horse-shoe, sometimes in a great flood it cuts across and makes a new channel, through which it tears its way and rushes down, a mad torrent, with fearful speed and violent turmoil. Such "cut-offs," as they are called, for a time lower the water above them, as it now has to run only a mile perhaps, or less, where it used to run twenty-five; but they make an awful destruction of the banks on one side or the other, both below and above, and ingulf whole plantations, until finally they create other bends. Even the clearing out the channel of the river by removing snags and other obstructions may change the current and cause valuable plantations to be washed away. There are petitions before the House now for compensation for great losses so produced.

TOWNS DESERTED BY THE RIVER.

As the river tears away the land on one side it builds up elsewhere. Plantations sometimes advance their fronts for miles, and towns that once were on the river's banks find it receding from them until they are left far inland, high and dry. Providence and Saint Joseph are examples. They are now left far away from their own landings. Natchitoches was once on the banks of Red River. Now the stream is three or four miles away from it at the nearest point on the north, and eight or nine on the east. The same thing has happened to cities in the Old World. The Vistula, the Po, and the Rhine have deserted cities, once located on their banks and the seats of a flourishing river commerce. Saint Louis was once threatened with such a disaster, but the vigilance and energy and public spirit of her citizens by proper action at great expense averted the imminent danger.

Mr. Speaker, I have now stated frankly, and as clearly and strongly as I am able in the brief time at my command, the difficulties in the way of the thorough protection of the delta from overflow. The great importance of the subject I trust will excuse my having taken more of the time of the House than otherwise would be proper. The question perhaps is new to most members not living in the valley of the Lower Mississippi, and it is one on which we will all wish to vote intelligently. I have shown the vast benefit conferred by levees, and the obstacles and dangers which ever confront them. Levees alone, I think it is evident, will never fully solve the problem of the floods of the Mississippi. They go very far toward its solution, but something more is required. What more is needed is a great question, and one which the ablest engineers of the age should be called upon to investigate thoroughly, and answer clearly and without mistake if possible. But perhaps I may be permitted, with great diffidence, to offer a few suggestions. Cannot some portion of the highest waters in time of floods, the portion which overflows and ravages the delta, be withdrawn from the river for a time and retained elsewhere safe and harmless?

This question has never been fully and fairly grappled with. It astounds men of mere routine, but it is worthy of respectful consideration and of the most profound and searching investigation. It should be remembered that confining the waters of the Mississippi within and near its banks between levees necessarily raises those waters in time of floods in some places several feet higher than they otherwise would rise. So true is this that Humphreys and Abbot in their famous report say that in the great flood of 1858 the waters at Memphis would have risen six and a half feet higher than they did if the river banks had been properly leveed opposite there and above.

That is easily understood. The river at Memphis is forty miles wide to-day. If all its waters there were shut in to the width of a mile it is plain that though they would rush onward faster toward the Gulf than now, the river would rise higher there than it does even in this time of disastrous floods. But in the time of the very highest floods, if the river did not rise as high as it does by from three to five feet in the worst parts, and from two to three feet in the lower delta, there would be no destructive floods, no overflows worth naming. This is admitted by all able engineers familiar with the subject. In such case the levees, if properly located and constructed, would be able to protect the lands behind them. When the Mississippi is already very high a heavy rise in a single one of its great tributaries will cause a desolating flood. For instance, if at such a time Red River, or the Arkansas, the Ohio, or the Missouri, suddenly rises very high, a fearful overflow of the whole delta region below its mouth is certain to result.

Now, able engineers say that the floods of Red River, for instance, can all be retained by making reservoirs of the lakes near it and drawing off the very high surplus waters into them until all danger for the lower river is past. Colonel G. W. Morse, a very eminent civil engineer, who, though a son of New England, has spent nearly forty years in professional labors and studies in the Red River region and the great lower delta of the Mississippi, and therefore knows its topography and its peculiarities very thoroughly, has given this subject much careful study, and has gone into elaborate calculations which demonstrate that the plan referred to is easily practicable. He shows that the amount of extra water delivered by Red River during thirty days in a time of flood, if running at the rate of five miles an hour, is only about eighty-two billion cubic feet, and that by leveeing on one side only some half-dozen lakes within convenient distance from the river, they would be capable of receiving and retaining the whole of that amount until long after the season of floods was past. This alone faithfully carried out would often protect the lower delta from floods.

But he shows more than this. Be it remembered that these lakes are surrounded by hills upon all sides except the one open to the river, so that one side of them only would require to be leveed. This makes the work of converting them into great reservoirs very simple and easy. Colonel Morse shows that the water contained in them, after each flood, could be let into the river again in time of low water, and for eight months of the year, if for so long a period the river should be too low for navigation, could add three feet to the depth of the water in the channel, thereby insuring at least five and a half or six feet of water for navigation during the entire year, where now steamboats have to lie up in the dry season of summer and fall. As the extra supply would be required only for five or six months at the utmost, there would be a certainty of at least six feet in the channel of the river the year round. The same result could be attained on many other tributaries, and partially at least on the Arkansas by utilizing its lakes and swamps, though not to the same degree perhaps on that river. The gain to the vast region of the Red, the Arkansas, the Wachita, the White, and Saint Francis Rivers, in good navigation, trade, commerce, and easy communication the year round is incalculable, in addition to permanently protecting from floods ten million acres of the richest lands on the globe!

The same system could be applied to the lakes and vast swamps on the sides of the Mississippi, often only two or three miles from its banks. Those swamps, with but a moderate amount of leveeing on one side and perhaps at their lower end also, could easily be converted into immense reservoirs, capable of holding vast volumes of water. This should never be let into them until the river was running very high and was just beginning to pour over its banks. Then the surplus that would form the overflow, if not taken up, should be allowed to pass into those great reservoirs, and be retained by them until the flood season was past. The river, at time of high waters, doubles its speed, (as all streams do under the pressure of freshets and floods,) and should be made to carry off all that it can with banks brimful, and its current running at the tremendous rate of more than six miles an hour. Thus the mass of its waters would be hurried to the sea, while the dangerous surplus, beyond the capacity of the river to contain would be quietly poured into its immense lake and swamp reservoirs, and there imprisoned where it could do no harm. Of course, after the danger of floods was entirely past, these waters would gradually be restored to the river again through the proper openings at the lower ends of the reservoirs, having meanwhile deposited their sediment. That process would in the course of ages reclaim those swamps, which would gradually become new vast areas of wonderful and inexhaustible fertility. This reservoir system, combined with the old levee system, and, in cases of weak and crumbling banks, with some species of revetment by fascines, piles, or otherwise, as practiced in Holland and other countries, would, I think, be competent to save the great delta. Neither system alone I think can do it. The union of all to some extent is indispensable to perfect success. The problem is too vast and too complicated to always be solved by any one of them unaided by the others.

Let no man tell me that the reservoir system is new and untried. Some sleepy gentleman near me calls it a wild dream. So earlier he called the ocean steamer, the railroad, and the telegraph. Many years ago Ellett and other able and gifted engineees, men of genius, not mere official routinists, proposed to make reservoirs on the tributaries and head-waters of the Ohio, to dam up its mountain streams and hold in their floods, to be drawn from in the dry seasons of the year, making it always navigable for the largest steamers. Reservoirs a wild dream! Go to India, and in the midst of the famine, now decimating her people under British rule, mark the ruins of her mighty tanks and reservoirs that ten and twenty centuries ago caught up the floods and saved the waters for the dry seasons of the year, then to be spread over the country by canals and a vast system of irrigation, giving fruitful fields and lands smiling with beauty and verdure and teeming with plenty, where now too often reigns the arid desolation of the dreary desert! So did the Moors by the same system make Southern Spain many centuries ago fourfold more beautiful and productive than it is now, treeless and without its old reservoirs, a prey to the fury of floods in the spring and to fearful droughts in the summer. New and untried! Go to Egypt, and there, older than the pyramids, is Lake Moeris, excavated by the labor of man thousands of years ago to receive a vast portion of the surplus waters of the Nile in time of its floods, and to give them up again in the dry season to irrigate and refresh the fields, and drive back the desert that ever menaced the plains with encircling barrenness and desolation!

I hear but two objections urged against this bill. One is that it will lead to great national undertakings on the Mississippi and its tributaries and to enormous expense, beyond the means and resources of the Government. But in the first place this bill does not propose for the Government to do anything at present except to have the whole subject thoroughly examined by the ablest experts in the world, and to procure the verdict of the highest scientific wisdom as to what is needed for the protection of the fairest portion of our common country from the most terrible calamities. Surely no one can possibly be opposed to that. His vote binds him no further. Is any member afraid to learn the facts? Gentlemen are fond of "investigating," anything and everything else. Are they afraid to have the floods of the Mississippi investigated?

But in the event that the nation shall at some future time conclude to do its duty as a great nation should by its suffering citizens of the Southwest, there is no reason to suppose that the expense of reclaiming the delta will be enormous. Humphreys and Abbot, in their report made in 1869, estimate the amount needed to construct first-class levees for the whole delta of the Mississippi to be only $38,230,000. Reservoirs, if adopted, would increase this amount somewhat, but not very largely, for then the levees would be smaller than they now are. Compared with the immense national benefits to be attained, this sum is but a mere trifle. Each nation in Europe large enough to have any rivers has expended vastly more. France has spent hundreds of millions upon the Rhone, the Loire, the Garonne, and her other streams. The Adige and the Po, in Italy, have cost from ten to twenty times what the Mississippi requires. Those rivers have been diked and leveed for many centuries. The difficulties to be overcome in the Old World, where rivers come rushing down the lofty slopes of the Alps with the force and the fury of the avalanche, were in some respects far greater than those which the civil engineer has to encounter in the valley of the Mississippi. The average height of all the dikes on the Vistula is twenty feet; the highest are twenty-eight, but the average height is double that of the levees of the Mississippi. The embankments of the Rhine are far higher than any dreamed of in America. In Holland, Friesland, and Zealand the dikes are from twenty-five to thirty-five feet high.

We may learn much in this connection from the example of a little state in Europe, which in spite of nature has carved for itself a great name in history. Holland is a land lower than the sea, and reclaimed by the labor and skill and courage of man from the dominion of the waters. For many centuries its people have battled with their rivers, the Scheldt, the Rhine, the Maas, the Waal, the Lech, &c., and have fought back the sea. Countless levees, which have splendid, well-paved roads on their tops, confine the waters of the rivers and the lakes. Enormous dikes keep out the sea. Innumerable canals furnish drainage and navigation. The finest pastures and meadows in Europe are the Dutch polders, so called, the bottoms of former lakes that were first leveed around and then pumped into the ocean. The great lake of Haarlem, ages ago, was thirteen miles long and six wide. But from time to time the sea broke in with its vast waves and raging storms, extending its bounds and devouring the land till Amsterdam and other cities were in danger. Then the spirit of the Dutch was roused as that of our people should be to-day. They grappled with the floods, shut out the sea by mighty barriers, and then pumped the famous old historic lake dry. And where once famous naval battles were fought between the Spaniards and the Dutch, centuries ago, you now behold green pastures, smiling fields, herds of cattle, and homes of men.

The government proposes now to reclaim to agriculture the famous sea or arm of the ocean called the Zuyder Zee, eighty miles long and twenty to thirty wide. That great work will be done, and beside it our task seems but child's play. Amsterdam and a hundred other cities of Holland stand where once rolled the sea, and on lands that were mere marshes for ages afterward, until man thoroughly reclaimed and beautified them. Holland in the course of centuries has expended on her dikes and levees, and in the reclamation of her soil, £300,000,000, a sum, allowing for the difference in the value of money in former days and now, larger than our national debt. And all Holland, its highlands as well as its lowlands, the whole kingdom of the Netherlands, in fact, is not one-hundredth part as large as the valley of the Mississippi, and only one-third the size of its delta. It is the manly qualities of her people that constitute her greatness, not the extent of her territory. She has suffered floods far more terrible than any our country has ever known, but she has conquered them. One of them, four and a half centuries ago, drowned one hundred thousand persons in a single night, but still she was undismayed. Each hour she is at work driving back the sea, and every day she adds seven more acres to her lands, year after year. If little Holland, a mere speck on the world's map, a land poor and desolate by nature, without a bed of coal, without a quarry of stone, without a single mine, without forests, without the rich staples of the commerce of the world on her own soil, could achieve results so gigantic and so stupendous, the American must have but the soul of a mouse who cries out that our country, with its vast extent of most valuable territory, with its rich mines of every mineral, and richer soil, reaching from ocean to ocean and grasping the unlimited wealth of half a continent, with all its grand and magnificent resources, cannot do the little that is needed for the drowning delta of the Mississippi. Have we sunk so low as that?

Occasionally a faint suggestion is ventured that the action proposed is unconstitutional, but surely the objection cannot be made in earnest. Floods in the great delta not only desolate that portion of our land, paralyzing its industries, blighting all its prospects, and utterly ruining its people, but they inflict vast injuries upon the whole country. Every section and every State feels the shock. The farmers of the West lose by it a valuable customer for their crops. Every man in the nation will pay more for his sugar and his cotton in consequence. The floods for a long period break up the railroads and the post-routes over a vast and valuable region of our country, and make it worse than a wilderness. Post-offices fail to receive their mails for weeks. Communication by land ceases. No railroad there can ever be a success so long as its bridges and its track can be washed away by every flood. The Post-Office Department of the nation is drowned out in that region by every great overflow, and yet gentlemen tell us that it is unconstitutional for the Government to stay the floods and save its own mails, its own post-offices, and post-roads.

These gentlemen find no constitutional difficulty in sending learned scientific commissions all over the world to observe the transits of Venus and the eclipses of the sun; but then they are more deeply interested perhaps in Venus than they are in their own country. They did not object to Wilkes's exploring expedition to investigate at an expense of millions antarctic icebergs and the cannibals of the Pacific, but possibly they felt a warmer sympathy for them than for their brethren in the valley of the Mississippi. They seem to think that our Government should be a Mrs. Jellaby, her eyes gazing afar off, forever weeping over Borriboola Gha, but forgetting and neglecting her own family. Lynch and his costly expedition might be sent six thousand miles away to explore the Jordan and the Dead Sea. Are those objects more national than the Mississippi and the millions of our citizens who live on its banks?

Sir, I am tired of hearing the doctrine that our national Government can do nothing at home, but only abroad. If American citizens suffer or are wronged on foreign soil, in Cuba or Mexico, in China or Japan, in England or Austria, the national arm is uplifted at once. The treasure of the nation is poured forth, fleets and armaments are created, armies crowd the astonished land, five millions of indignant patriots volunteer as officers, the American eagle screams angrily and fearfully; every man is ready to sacrifice everything but himself and his for his country's honor and glory. But here, in our own land, when a hundred thousand homes are desolated by the floods ten years out of every thirty or forty, and hundreds of thousands of our own citizens reduced to starvation and ruin, we are told that the Government cannot interfere, cannot stretch forth its powerful arm to prevent in future the enormous sufferings of its own people, who are powerless to help themselves, but shall look coldly on, callous and indifferent. This cannot be. It would be a disgrace and an infamy, making every true American hang his head with shame, if the Government of this great country were indeed the only one on earth that could not protect and rescue its own people at home from ever-recurring calamity and ruin. It is a national work that is to be done. It is the great engineering problem of the age.

Shall the one vast inland sea of our nation, as Mr. Calhoun rightly called it, be regulated and restrained for the common good of all, or shall it be allowed to continue to desolate and blast with ruin the fairest portion of our common country? The investigations to be made and permanent plans to be decided on require the studies and counsels of the ablest engineers in the world. It is a work that should be perfect if possible. A complete success would benefit and enrich the whole nation grandly and immensely. If it only restored and reinvigorated the sugar-planting interest of the delta it would keep at home the $60,000,000 in gold we send abroad annually for sugar, and in time enable us to resume specie payments and to become financially respectable once more. It would give us an absolute supremacy in the cotton markets of the world. It would speed the wings of commerce and quicken the plow, the reaper, and the mower on millions of fields and farms. It would enable the South to buy of the Northwest flour, grain, and provisions to the amount of $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 every year; and also to buy and pay for twice or thrice as much as heretofore of the goods and manufactures of the North and East. It would wake up our whole country to new life and energy and enterprise. As an instance of what it would do I may mention that the cotton trade of Memphis, now some six hundred thousand bales per annum, would soon grow up to three or four million bales, and a somewhat similar impulse would be given to the great business interests of the whole nation.

I say frankly that $10,000 is too small a sum for the purposes proposed. It is unworthy the grave importance of this commission, and I do not believe that any member wishes to cut us down to so small a sum. I trust that more will be cheerfully granted. The thorough protection and reclamation of the great delta would be everywhere regarded at the South not only as an act of justice and wise statesmanship, but as a grand and noble exhibition of kindness, of conciliation, and fraternal affection by the North. During the war the great levees were cut in hundreds of places by the Federal armies. The awful desolating floods poured like an ocean over the vast delta, and its people have never recovered from that fearful calamity. If now the North will generously aid us with the treasure and the science and all the beneficent powers of the nation to repair the ruin it wrought, every southern heart will throb with joy at this new evidence of the fraternal feeling of the nation. The Government will be known by the rich blessings it confers, and each warm-hearted, generous, impulsive son of the South will once more thank God that he too is an American; that he also has a country to love and honor. Born in the North, but loving and honoring both sections alike; proud of the achievements, the glories, and the heroism of each and all, I ask that this great measure, the beginning of a mighty work, be passed unanimously, as an offering at once of justice and of love upon the sacred altar of our common country. Pass it, and the exclamation from every true American everywhere shall be, "We are brothers once more!" Pass this, and next year commence also to improve the navigation of the Mississippi—which can easily be done—till the mightiest steamers that plow the ocean can run from Liverpool to Memphis, right in the great heart of the South, giving us in the coming future a foreign trade like that New York now enjoys; and the West, the South, and the great valley of the Mississippi, growing into new greatness and power, with an ever-increasing prosperity, will feel that at length their rights have been justly recognized, their wishes and interests wisely consulted, and that the strong arm of the national Government is indeed a protection and a blessing to them.

It has been urged by some gentlemen that the commission proposed should consist of Army engineers only; but this would be neither wise nor expedient. Some of the great civil engineers of our country, men of great and commanding eminence in their profession, should have a place on this board. Men are needed of the highest order of talent, men of wide-awake, active, inventive intellect, and who possess a thorough personal knowledge of the Mississippi. Men who have spent their lives in studying and confining and guiding the waters of the mighty river; men who have spent a third of a century, and some of them nearly forty years, in the labors, studies, and constant practice of civil engineering in protecting and reclaiming the great lower delta; men who, in the practice of their profession as civil engineers, have reclaimed millions of acres, until as the fruits of their labors and their toil, their study, their long years of patient thought, their science and skill and courage, they have rescued from the waves thousands of vast sugar and cotton plantations, and beheld beautiful villages, towns, and cities built on sites that but for them had remained swamps and marshes for centuries yet to come; such men surely should have some recognition on the board proposed. All the science in the world cannot dispense with practical knowledge and experience. New men will be incompetent alone until they have had many years of hard experience in learning and mastering the mysteries of that awful river just as these men have already done. No reading, no mere book-learning can give men the practical knowledge that in this case is indispensably necessary. As well learn to swim merely by reading on dry land; as well learn to manage a ship at sea by study in your closet, and then think yourself a sailor; as well expect a man to discover the north pole by reading Kane and Hall and staying at home, as to expect men of mere learning and science, without long practical experience, to understand the Mississippi or to discover the best means of confining its waters and reclaiming its great delta to the uses of man.

The great engineers of the world are not the mere products of schools. They cannot have too much learning, of course; no man can. Scientific training even in governmental schools is valuable, but too often it fails utterly to produce original thinkers. It makes of a man's mind a mere reservoir instead of an ever-living fountain. Its product too often is a mere placid mud-puddle or a simple duck-pond of knowledge, rather than a seething volcano of thought and intellectual energy. West Point will never make a great inventive engineer; the Almighty alone can do that. The other day a gentleman told the House that any Army officers would do for this commission; that they all had studied engineering of some kind at West Point. As well tell us that any one of the middies who graduated at Annapolis was perfectly competent to take the place of Farragut at Fort Saint Philip and Mobile, or of Nelson at Aboukir and Trafalgar! As well say that any graduate of West Point could have filled the place of Sherman or of Grant, of Johnson or of Lee in our late war, or could have shown a Napoleon how to be a great general.

The reclamation of the delta of the Mississippi is a task as stupendous as the greatest victories in war, and requires the very highest trained talent, intellect, and genius. It requires great experience and consummate knowledge of the river, its floods, its mysteries, and its laws. Great rivers in their courses have their laws which they obey just as much as the planets in their orbits; but their dynamics and their laws are the most obscure, the least known, and the most difficult of all branches of physical science.

The Soolina Pass commission, which was appointed by the great governments of Europe a few years ago to open the Danube to the navigation of the world, and which accomplished that most difficult undertaking so splendidly and with such brilliant success, was a mixed commission—two army engineers and two distinguished civil engineers. We will do wisely to make a similar selection, and of men equally able and gifted. They have a great work to do.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STANARD.]

Mr. STANARD. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that when this matter should come up for final discussion and action, I should be allowed at least fifteen minutes; but the limited time alloted to the subject to-day has been so far consumed that but five minutes are left for me. Perhaps it is as well, for the matter has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and is I believe well understood. I was very much interested in the speech made by my distinguished friend from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] It would give me great pleasure to follow his advice, because I am satisfied that there is no member here who gives more careful consideration or more intelligent criticism to the business of this House than he does. But while I admit this, I am satisfied that if he lived nearer the center of population and wealth—nearer to the body of the tax-payers of this country than he does—his views would be broader with reference to the measures looking to the common good than they are, in view of his residence in the extreme northeastern portion of this country.

As a member of the Committee on the Mississippi Levees, I have given the subject some consideration—not so much, however, as other members of the committee. It was expected, sir, when this Congress convened that some measure for the commencement of the work of constructing levees and reclaiming lands would be inaugurated by Congress. But the committee, after thoroughly investigating the matter, came to the conclusion that they had not before them sufficient data of a reliable character to justify them in recommending that the United States should commence so great a work. In lieu of such a measure they have introduced a bill providing for the appointment of commissioners who shall make examinations and investigate the subject, so as to be enabled to make an intelligent and reliable recommendation to Congress at the next session. For this purpose we ask an appropriation of $10,000. We propose that the commission shall consist of two officers of the United States Engineer Corps and three eminent civil engineers, who, in the language of the bill, "are acquainted with the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River."

I hope, sir, that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Vermont will be voted down. It simply provides for two United States engineers. What we want is reliable and intelligent information. If we can get it from any other source than from the officers of the Engineer Corps, as we believe we can—adding testimony, intelligence, and experience to the testimony, intelligence and experience already had—we want to do so and are willing to pay for it, and we should have it, if the Government expects to enter upon this great work of improving the levees and reclaiming the lands. For this purpose, and for no other, we ask that there shall be on this commission three eminent civil engineers. All those who are acquainted along the Mississippi River know that there are many scientific men among the civil engineers of this country who have given more attention to this subject than have the United States Corps of Engineers, because this has never been designated as a special portion of their business.

I hope that the substitute will be voted down, and that this bill appropriating $10,000 will be passed. The passage of the bill does not necessarily commit the Government to the work. It simply provides for obtaining necessary information for the use of Congress or the States, if you please, or individuals it may be, who shall in future undertake to do this work.

[Here the hammer fell.]

I would like a few minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to extending the gentleman's time?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads wish to submit their report this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. One objection is sufficient.

Mr. MOREY. As there remain but a few moments, I will simply call for a vote, asking the House not to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont. The amendment offered by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] to provide that the majority of these commissioners shall be United States Army officers, is acceptable to the committee. Under that amendment, if adopted, the board will consist of three Army engineers and two civilian engineers familiar with the alluvial basin of the Mississippi Valley. I now call for a vote on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has offered an amendment providing that the commission shall consist of three Army engineers and two civil engineers from public life. To this amendment the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] has offered an amendment, providing for one Army officer instead of three.

The amendment of Mr. FORT was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. MOREY. On behalf of the committee I accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as adopted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CROCKER. May I be allowed a minute or two?

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. CROCKER. I have only a word to say to this House, and particularly to my friends from the South. I cannot vote for this measure or anything that is substantially the same in form. If the State of Louisiana or the people of Louisiana would convey, for what they may be worth, the submerged lands, which are of value sufficient to feed a whole nation, I should be most happy then to vote for a measure which would give the Government the benefit arising from the enhanced value of the land after the improvement is made. But with my present views I cannot, notwithstanding my sympathy for the South, vote for the measure in the shape now presented.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, it was not agreed to; there being ayes 25, noes not counted.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I ask that the bill as now amended may be read.

The bill, as amended, was read, as follows:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to assign three officers of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, and to appoint two civil engineers eminent in their profession and who are acquainted with the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River, to serve as a board of commissioners; the president of said board to be designated by the President of the United States. It shall be the duty of said commission to make a full report to the President of the best system for the permanent reclamation and redemption of said alluvial basin from inundation, which report the President shall transmit to Congress at its next session with such recommendations as he shall think proper.

SEC. 2. That the members of the commission who may be appointed from civil life shall receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum. The commission may employ a secretary at a rate of compensation not exceeding $200 per month for the time he is employed, and the necessary traveling expenses of the members of said commission not officers of the Army, and of the secretary, shall be paid upon the approval of bills for the same by the Secretary of War.

SEC 3. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry into effect the foregoing provisions, is hereby appropriated, and shall be subject to disbursement by the Secretary of War in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MOREY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FITZHUGH LEE.

Mr. SENER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate amendment to House bill No. 2866, for relieving the political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee. The Senate strike out the words "legal and" before the words "political disabilities." I ask that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

No objection was made, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SENER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

B. W. HARRIS.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table and concur in an amendment of the Senate to a bill of the House for the relief of B. W. HARRIS, one of my colleagues in this House, late collector of internal revenue in Massachusetts. The amendment of the Senate is to insert after the word "sums" the words "not to exceed $346.53."

Mr. WELLS. I object.

VAN R. MORGAN.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that Senate bill No. 325, to relieve the political disabilities of Van R. Morgan, of Virginia, and containing no other provision whatever, be taken from the Speaker's table and passed at this timed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PACKER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of reports from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. SESSIONS. When the House took a recess on Tuesday last, it was considering Senate bill No. 733, regulating gas-works, upon which the previous question had been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question, as the Chair is informed, was not seconded, but had been demanded.

Mr. SESSIONS. If it had not been ordered, it had been called for, and the bill was being read pending the call.

The SPEAKER. The usage of the House is that, when a day has been set apart for the consideration of reports from a certain committee, they are confined to that day, and nothing goes over to the next day, unless it has the previous question ordered upon it.

Mr. SESSIONS. Then I ask consent that the bill may be taken up and acted upon now. It is a very important bill, and will not take long to consider it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. COTTON. I would ask the Chair where that gas bill is now?

The SPEAKER. In the possession of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COTTON. It is not before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House at all.

Mr. COTTON. I would like to have the bill set for say a week from next Monday, which will be District of Columbia day, as the District is concerned in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Permission may be given to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SESSIONS] to report it on that day as a part of the District reports, it being allied with the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COTTON. I ask that that be done.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection that will be done.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

POSTAGE ON PRINTED MATTER.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 3414, to provide for the prepayment of postage on printed matter, and for other purposes.

The bill, which was read, provides that on all newspapers and periodical publications mailed from a known office of publication or news agency and addressed to regular subscribers or news agents, postage shall be charged at the following rates: On newspapers and periodical publications issued weekly and more frequently than once a week, one cent and five mills for each pound or fraction thereof; and on those issued less frequently than once a week, three cents for each pound or fraction thereof: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to change or amend section 99 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872.

The second section provides that upon the receipt of such newspapers and periodical publications at the office of mailing they shall be weighed in bulk, and postage paid thereon by a special adhesive stamp, to be devised and furnished by the Postmaster-General, which shall be affixed to such matter, the sack containing the same, upon a memorandum of such mailing, to be made, or otherwise, as the Postmaster-General may, from time to time, provide by regulation.

The third section provides that newspapers, one copy to each actual subscriber residing within the county where the same are printed in whole or in part and published, shall go free through the mails; but the same shall not be delivered at letter-carrier offices or distributed by carriers unless postage is paid thereon as by law provided; and newspapers and magazines reciprocally interchanged between publishers, and not exceeding sixteen ounces in weight, to be confined to a single copy of each publication, shall go free through the mails.

The fourth section provides that all mailable matter of the third class, referred to in section 133 of the act mentioned in the first section, may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof, and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; but that nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 134 of said act.

The fifth section provides that the Postmaster-General may prescribe by regulation an affidavit in form, to be taken by each publisher of any newspaper or periodical publication sent through the mails under the provisions of this act, or news agent who distributes any of such newspapers or periodical publications under the provisions of this act, or employé of such publisher or news agent, stating that he will not send, or knowingly permit to be sent, through the mails any copy or copies of such newspaper or periodical publications except to regular subscribers thereto or news agents or as an exchange, without prepayment of the postage thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof; and if such publisher or news agent or employé of such publisher or news agent, when required by the Postmaster-General or any special agent of the Post-Office Department to make such affidavit, shall refuse so to do, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 for each refusal; and if any person shall knowingly and willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act or procure the same to be done, or if any postmaster or post-office official shall knowingly permit any matter to be mailed without the prepayment of postage, as provided in this act and in violation of the provisions of the same, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding three years, one or both, in the discretion of the court.

The sixth section provides that sections 3 and 4 of this act shall be in force from and after its passage; and the other sections of this act shall be in force on and after the 1st day of January, 1875.

The amendments reported from the committee were to the second section of the bill, to make it read as follows:

SEC. 2. That upon the receipt of such newspapers and periodical publications at the office of mailing, they shall be weighed in bulk, and postage paid thereon by a special adhesive stamp, to be devised and furnished by the Postmaster-General which shall be affixed to such matter, or to the sack containing the same, or upon a memorandum of such mailing, or otherwise, as the Postmaster-General may, from time to time, provide by regulation.

The amendments were agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Permit me to offer an amendment so it may be voted on.

Mr. CANNON. We have other business, and I must insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to make it one and two cents instead of one and a half and three cents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. CONGER. I understand there is a penalty for mailing any papers contrary to the provisions of this law, or offering to mail them, of a thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Not exceeding a thousand dollars.

Mr. CONGER. Such a penalty for offering to mail newspapers——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines, as it is his right, to yield for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I do not wish to lose the control of the bill, and before I demand the previous question——

Mr. CONGER. I object to his withdrawing the previous question.

The SPEAKER. He has the right to do it.

Mr. CONGER. Does the Chair state that he has the right to withdraw the demand for the previous question after it is once made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw the demand for the previous question, which he has done.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster-General in his last annual report recommended that the postal code be so amended as to require the prepayment of postage upon newspapers and periodical publications, stating in substance that it is estimated by experienced postal officers that not to exceed one-third of the postage on this class of matter is collected and an account thereof rendered to the Department, and that he was satisfied under a judicious system of prepayment, with a deduction of 40 per cent. from the present rates, there would be an increase in the revenues from that source. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have given this matter careful attention, and report a bill and ask its passage by the House which provides for prepayment upon this class of matter; and I ask the attention of the House while I briefly refer to the present law and its imperfections, the amount of revenue realized under it and the amount that should be realized, to the provisions of the bill reported, and the amount of revenue that will be collected under it if it shall become a law.

The present law, section 158 of the postal code, is as follows:

That on newspapers and other periodical publications, not exceeding four ounces in weight, sent from a known office of publication to regular subscribers, postage shall be charged at the following rates per quarter, namely: on publications issued less frequently than once a week, at the rate of one cent for each issue; issued once a week, five cents; and five cents additional for each issue more frequent than once a week. And an additional rate shall be charged for each additional four ounces or fraction thereof in weight.

You will notice that the postage is the same whether the paper or periodical is small or large, so long as it does not exceed the maximum weight fixed by law, namely, twenty cents a year on weekly papers not exceeding four ounces in weight, and twenty cents a year additional for each issue more frequent than once a week, and one cent for each issue less frequent than once a week; or if it exceeds four ounces in weight, then one cent additional for each four ounces or fraction thereof; and if the papers are of the maximum weight, then a weekly, fifty-two copies per annum, thirteen pounds, yields twenty cents per annum, or one and seven-thirteenths cents per pound, and a monthly, twelve numbers, eight ounces each, aggregating six pounds, yields twenty-four cents, or four cents a pound. The truth is, however, that while a few of the large weeklies, like Harper's, Leslie's, and the Independent, weigh, say, three and one-fourth ounces, or three-fourths of an ounce less than the maximum, the majority of papers like the Tribune, Times, and Herald, of New York, and the Tribune, Times, and Inter-Ocean, of Chicago, and other metropolitan papers, weigh from one and one-half to two and one-half ounces, making an average of, say, two ounces, and practically yield postage, if it was collected, at the rate of three cents a pound. From the census report of 1870 as to the amount of this class of matter, and from observation of vigilant postal officers and publishers as to the percentage of this matter passing through the mails, as well as from thirty days' weighing of this class of matter in seven of the principal cities of the country during the past winter, under the present law the revenue from postage on this class of matter should have been for the year 1870 $2,704,261.44. The amount actually collected was $835,727.99, leaving $1,869,533.45 which never was collected, or if collected was not accounted for by postmasters. The data from which such calculation is made and result shown, with particular statement of calculation not only as to this but as to many other matters touching the subject under consideraion, I print with my remarks as table No. 4.

It should be borne in mind, however, that this class of matter passing through the mails has increased since 1870 at least 20 per cent., and that the revenues now ought to be thereon under present law, in round numbers, $3,250,000, and were last year in round numbers $1,100,000; making $2,150,000 that was not collected. As further evidence of the correctness of this estimate as to the amount of this class of matter passing through the mails, I print with my remarks tables numbered 1, 2, 3, giving the weight of first, second, and third class matter received for mailing for thirty consecutive days during the past winter at some of the principal offices in the United States, namely, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Pittsburgh, with a statement of the amount of postage that should have been collected from each class, and the amount that would be collected from the second class—papers and periodicals—under a judicious system of prepayment at different rates; from which it appears, including transient papers, that about 89 per cent. of all mailable matter is made up of newspapers and periodical publications alone—9 per cent. of letters, and 2 per cent. of books and merchandise; there being forty-three tons daily of newspapers and periodicals mailed at the New York City post-office alone. It also appears that if the postage was all collected on newspapers and periodical publications mailed at these seven cities at rates under the present law, it would largely exceed all the postage collected on the same class of matter in the whole of the United States for the last fiscal year; and even with the reduction in the rates in the bill proposed by the committee, now under consideration, coupled with prepayment of postage, the revenues from these seven cities on this class of matter will be within $150,000 of what it was upon the same class of matter last year in the whole United States.

Mr. Speaker, these facts, when considered by members, should prompt them to action; and certainly a failure upon our part to pass such laws as will secure a collection of these revenues would be, to say the least of it, gross negligence, or show an utter disregard of our duty as legislators in the premises. And before I speak of the provisions of the bill which we ask the House to pass, I will inquire for a moment as to the reason of the non-collection of these postages, so that we can consider intelligently what the provisions of the law should be which we propose to enact. The present law allows all this matter to go through the mails from the office of publication to the subscribers without prepayment, and makes it the duty of over thirty-three thousand postmasters to collect this postage quarterly from the individual subscribers, and practically there is no way in which the Post-Office Department can tell whether this postage is collected or not; or, in other words, there is no system of checks upon the thirty-three thousand postmasters whose duty it is to make these collections; and it is the observation of many that in fact the postmasters throughout the country do not collect the five or six cents per quarter from the different subscribers; and where the postmaster is dishonest, even if he does collect it, the Department cannot tell whether he accounts for all that is collected, and so this large amount of money is not received by the Government.

There is another light in which this matter should be looked at of as much importance as the loss of revenues to the Government. And that is the moral effect of the present law; it tends to debauch the public service, promotes negligence in those charged with its execution, and is a standing premium offered by the Government for dishonesty. And while I am satisfied that the great majority of postmasters are honest men, yet when we recollect that one of the special matters that followers of the Founder of our religion were taught was "Lead us not into temptation," certainly this law, which is a constant temptation to every man charged with its execution, should not longer remain as one of the statutes.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now being considered provides that all newspapers and periodical publications issued weekly and more frequently than once a week, mailed by publishers or news agents to regular subscribers or news agents, shall be charged postage at the rate of one and one-half cents per pound, and those issued less frequently than once a week at the rate of three cents a pound; that the same shall be weighed in bulk at the office of mailing, and postage prepaid by affixing an adhesive stamp, to be prepared by the Postmaster-General, to the matter, sack containing the same, or a memorandum of such mailing as the postmaster may by regulation provide. This is a reduction from the present rates of four-hundredths of a cent on papers and periodicals issued weekly and more frequently than once a week, and of 25 per cent. on those issued less frequently than once a week, provided that they all weighed up to the maximum, namely, either four or eight ounces; but it is really a reduction in fact of from one-fourth to one-half, and in many cases more, upon all periodicals and papers, as but few of them are up to the maximum weight under the present law. For example, Harper's Monthly Magazine, which weighs seven and six-tenths ounces, the reduction is over one-fourth, while upon the lighter magazines, like the Atlantic, Peterson's, Godey's, Saint Nicholas, and others, it is much more. Upon Harper's Weekly, Leslie's, and the Independent, which weigh from three to three and a quarter ounces, the reduction is over one-fourth; while upon the Tribune, Herald, Times, Post, Sun, and other metropolitan papers, weighing from one and one-half to two and one-half ounces, the reduction is substantially one-half. When the paper weighs two ounces, it is over one-half.

I print with my remarks a table—No. 4—which shows what at the present rates of postage the compensation to the Government is for each pound of matter carried, or rather would be if collected, and varies from 1.54 cents per pound on weekly papers and dailies weighing four ounces to 6.15 cents per pound for those weighing one ounce, and from 4 cents per pound on magazines weighing eight ounces to 6.4 cents per pound on those weighing five ounces; and also shows what the postage would be under this bill at 1½ cents per pound on those papers and publications issued weekly and more frequently, which is $1,116,442.98, and on those issued less frequently than once a week at 3 cents per pound is $649,326.27; a total of $1,765,769.25. This being upon data for 1870. Add 20 per cent. for increase, $353,153.94; which gives $2,118,923.19 as the amount of revenue from postage on this class of matter that will be produced by prepayment at this reduced rate, and which is over $1,000,000 more than was produced last year under the present law.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not all the saving to the Government that would accrue under the proposed law. As the law now is the commissioners paid to the thirty-three thousand postmasters for collecting the postage will amount to 40 per cent. of the same, which on the $1,100,000 collected last year was $440,000. Under this bill nearly all the postage will be collected in cities where the salary of postmasters is $4,000, and under the law they cannot be higher, and will be that high whether they collect this postage by prepayment or not; so the collection of this postage will not cost the Government any considerable amount, and besides a very considerable force of clerks who have the quarterly accounts of postmasters to examine as to those papers in the Post-Office Department can be dispensed with. So that if we pass this law we have postage collected, $2,118,923.29; commission paid on collection, $440,000; total, $2,558,923.29. From which deduct amount collected last year, $1,100,000; leaving as amount that will be saved per annum by this bill, $1,458,923.29.

And right here let me add, that this will not injuriously affect postmasters. Indeed many of them are anxious for this bill to pass, for the reason that while the commissions paid them for collecting aggregate a large amount, yet the amount each postmaster gets is not an adequate compensation for services performed in making collections.

Mr. Speaker, objection has been made to this bill that it reduces the rate of postage and that the rates are already too low, as newspapers and periodicals make nine-tenths of all the mails, costing the Government for that proportion of matter $26,000,000, and only yielding a revenue of $1,100,000, leaving a deficit on that kind of matter of nearly $25,000,000; while the other one-tenth of mail matter, costing the Government $3,000,000 to carry it—its proportion of the total cost—yields a revenue of nearly $22,000,000. I submit that it is sufficient answer to this that while a reduction of rates is conceded, yet the saving to the Government is more than doubled on this class of matter, and the amount that is charged will be collected. Further, it has been the practice of the Government, and I believe a wise one, to assist in this way in the dissemination of knowledge; that, and not the revenues from postage, being the prime consideration.

I need not stop here to demonstrate that knowledge universally disseminated among the citizens of the Republic is the only guarantee of its permanency. But we are told that some publishers are opposed to the passage of this bill, for the reason that they will have to pay those postages out of their own pockets and cannot increase the price of their papers to the subscribers. This is no doubt substantially true, and I am satisfied that they can make money at it and at the same time the people be relieved from payment of the same, as by this bill the payment of postage is made in bulk and simplified; and great numbers of people who now get their papers and magazines through news agents in preference to being annoyed by duns for payment of small amounts of postage quarterly would deal directly with the publisher, and the publishers thereby would save a considerable profit which they now pay to the news agents to sell their publications, which amount on each issue many times exceeds the amount of postage the publisher would have to pay.

Again, if this bill becomes a law I believe the rates fixed thereby would be permanent; a matter greatly to be desired in this case as well as generally; while if the law remains as it is now or the rates were reduced to a lower sum than fixed by this bill, in my opinion the agitation concerning the same would be a constant source of annoyance to the people, the Department, and the publishers. This bill also provides that papers shall go free in the mails to subscribers in counties where published. The committee believe that this is nothing more than a fair compensation to the people in the rural districts for the free-delivery system exclusively enjoyed by the people in the cities.

The bill also provides that matter of the third class, in packages not exceeding four pounds in weight, may pass through the mails at a uniform rate of one cent for two ounces or fraction thereof. This will be a matter of great accommodation to the people and of profit to the Department; for counting the fractions in favor of the Department the rate of postage will average ten cents a pound at least on this class of matter, while newspapers only pay one and a half cents per pound and periodicals three cents per pound. Nor is there danger of this class of matter burdening the mails; for, as shown by tables published herewith, in seven cities for thirty days only 2 per cent. of the whole amount of matter mailed was of this kind, and it is estimated, to take the whole country, that not over ½ of 1 per cent. of the whole mail matter is made up of books and merchandise.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Why should there be a difference in postage on newspapers and on magazines?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There are two reasons for it. The practice has grown up in the country in legislation in reference to post-office affairs to do so, so that it is in the line of precedent. Another reason is that the papers, being cheaper publications, come to the great mass of the people, and I suppose this legislation was had with the idea that it involved the interests of the great mass of the people. Still another reason is that the newspaper men and the magazine men, even those who do not publish newspapers, agree that their rate should be twice as high as the rate on newspapers.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would the RECORD be regarded as a newspaper or a magazine?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Well, sir, under this bill the rate is fixed with reference to the frequency of the publications. There is nothing directly said in the bill in relation to magazines and newspapers as such. We say that a cent and a half a pound shall be the price on one class of publications, and three cents upon another. There is nothing said about newspapers or periodicals, although the arrangement has been made with regard to them.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I hope the gentleman will allow those who are opposed to this bill to be heard.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the previous question shall be ordered, I will give as much time as I can in justice to my committee. I am nearly through myself, with this explanation.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he bases his calculation of the newspapers carried through the mail upon the census return?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Only partially so; partially upon the census return, but more particularly upon the result of the weighing made for a month during the last winter, which verified the data from the last census return and the tables I publish herewith.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Does the gentleman not know that a large proportion of the circulation of the larger newspapers goes by express and does not go by mail at all? I wish to know whether or not the gentleman has taken that into account.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have taken that into account, and will again state for the benefit of the gentleman from New York that the calculation I now hold in my hand is on the basis of 10 per cent. of the dailies and 60 per cent. of the weeklies and monthlies passed through the mail, and upon the further basis that for the thirty days during the past year, when this matter was weighed in the seven principal cities of the country, it weighed in the aggregate over four million pounds, making the amount in those seven cities alone about fifty million pounds per annum, if the same ratio was kept up during the other eleven months. So the gentleman will see that the calculation is not too large. According to the census report it would be ninety-six million pounds. In seven cities alone you have fifty million pounds, leaving all the rest of the country to make up the other forty-six millions.

It is true, sir, that no man can say that this is exactly accurate. In the nature of things you cannot get it to a precise dot. But I do say from my investigation and from the investigation of the Department, this being a table made up at the Department and from the best data which can be got, I believe that this approximates a true statement.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman tell the House what will be the amount of revenue that will come into the Treasury if all this matter is required to pay first-class postage?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean the same as letters?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I do.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The letters now constitute about 8 per cent. of the mail matter, and it yields a revenue of about $19,000,000. Now eight into ninety (90 per cent. of mail matter being papers and magazines,) will go eleven times; eleven times nineteen millions of dollars and you have it. You see it would be over $200,000,000 if you charged at the same rates that you do for letters. But you cannot do that. I think that in all conscience when you reduce the postage on printed matter to one and a half and three cents per pound it is low enough. If you will consider, those of you who have been paying postage on Agricultural Reports at the rate of thirty-two cents a copy, you will see that you could send them off for three cents a copy provided you could send them at the same rates papers go. Some say here that they want to make the rates one and two cents a pound on papers and periodicals, instead of one and a half and three cents a pound. Under the instruction of the committee I cannot accept that amendment, and unless the House votes down the previous question of course it will not come in.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Does the gentleman hold that he has the right to argue his side alone, and then ask the House not to hear the other side at all?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the previous question is ordered I suppose I will have an hour, and I will give the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] a due amount of time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. You will not allow any amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not if I can get the previous question, as my committee have instructed me to take the sense of the House on the bill without amendment.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Will the gentleman answer just one question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The gentleman spoke of the postage on the Agricultural Report; did he mean to say that the public documents would go as newspapers?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, not at all. What I wished was to show by comparison that the postage was merely a nominal not a substantial thing when you come to apply it to the publications of the country. Let no man suppose that I am grumbling about that matter. I would be willing to go a step farther and to say perhaps that these matters might go free through the mails in order that intelligence and information might be disseminated throughout the country. But I suppose we are not ready yet to take that step; therefore I am not advocating that policy at this time.

There is one further fact to which I wish to call attention. As these postages are now collected, it costs in round numbers on an average 40 per cent. of the amount to collect it. In other words, out of $1,100,000 collected last year, $440,000 were paid to thirty-three thousand postmasters. Under this bill there will be a saving, because in the large cities, where the great bulk of the matter is mailed, the salaries of postmasters are now just as they will be whether they collect this postage or not. Thus there is a saving of $440,000 in this item of commissions alone. The country postmasters do not grumble at this, because while the amount is large in the aggregate, it does not in the individual cases amount to enough to pay them for their trouble. I hold in my hand petitions from postmasters, from newspaper men, from private citizens, from representatives of almost all classes, asking the passage of this bill.

Mr. FORT. Has the gentleman any petitions from express companies?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I believe not, and I have looked over them pretty carefully. I guess the express companies are not in favor of this bill, and I thank the gentleman for calling attention to that fact.

Mr. GUNCKEL. If I understand this bill, it imposes the same labor as heretofore upon the postmasters receiving the smallest salaries, while at the same time their pay is reduced. Is not that so?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Well, they are anxious to have this measure passed.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Do they ask for it?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. GUNCKEL. How many petitions has the gentleman from postmasters?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman will hear me I will make the matter plain to him. I have taken the pains to write, making inquiry; and everywhere there comes up from the postmasters the cry: "Relieve us from this burden, because while we get 40 per cent. commission on the aggregate, it does not pay us for running around four times a year and dunning this man for five cents and that man for five cents." When you come to scatter $440,000 among thirty-three thousand people how much does it amount to in any individual case? It will hardly buy the tobacco of a careful, economical man.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Are the petitions from postmasters printed blanks sent out by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, sir; there are no printed blanks among them. I am not in that kind of business.

I am admonished by the clock that I must draw my remarks to a close, as there are some other gentlemen who may perhaps want to say something about this matter. I will simply reserve to myself the right of occupying, if it be necessary, two or three minutes in reply after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. TYNER. I wish to put to the gentleman an inquiry. By section 3 of the bill it is provided that newspapers, one copy to each subscriber, shall pass free through the mails in the county of their publication. Does that include dailies and all other newspapers, or is it limited to weeklies?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did not intend so to limit it nor did the committee. The gentleman will observe if he reads the section through that it does not interfere with the business at a letter-carrier office. If it did, that would be the only objection—that it would block up that class of officers. But the committee believed that it was no more than a fair compensation for the free-delivery system, the carrier system if you please in the cities, that the country people should receive their papers free of postage, not only weekly but semi-weekly and daily, in the counties where the papers are published.

Mr. TYNER. One other question in regard to the practical workings of the bill. It is provided that "all postage shall be paid upon newspapers by weight at the office of mailing by the use of adhesive stamps." In many of the large cities of the country papers are carried directly to the cars and are there mailed, never going into the mailing office at all. In what way will this provision operate in that respect?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I had the same impression about this matter that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] had until I came into communication with Mr. James, the postmaster at New York City, who informed me that that was a mistake, that every pound of mail matter passed through the office. And the gentleman will notice that even if he is right about that, it is no trouble to drive a wagon upon scales at any of these great offices and weigh the matter. It can be done in a minute or two, and then the wagon can be driven directly to the cars.

Mr. TYNER. Then this provision does not require that stamps shall be placed on each paper?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, sir. It is not necessary to put stamps on each newspaper, but to put the stamps as the Postmaster-General may by regulation direct, upon the sack or upon the memorandum of such mailing, which does not accompany it at all, and when the matter comes into the office the postage is to be considered prima facie as paid.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman ought to be aware of this fact—and I am throwing out these suggestions not to antagonize the bill but to get at some idea of its practical working—the gentleman ought to know if these newspapers are mailed on trains instead of at post-offices it will be necessary to have some officer of the Post-Office Department always at hand to superintend their weighing and mailing.

Mr. KASSON. There are such officers in the postal cars now.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. But every train going out is not a mail train.

Mr. TYNER. If the proposition is to have scales erected somewhere near the depot the postal car may be a quarter of a mile from that point, and the officer of the Department whose duty it is to superintend the weighing may be a quarter of a mile away at the time the wagon containing these mails shall be driven up. If he abandons the postal car and goes back to superintend the weighing, in many instances where the connection is close the train must either go away without the officer of the Department or leave the mails behind.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I consulted with Mr. James, of the Post-Office Department, and he said that there was no difficulty whatever about it; that it could be weighed and handled as it is now.

Let me call attention to this fact: You can hire two or three men at every one of these great post-offices to weigh this matter. You will save money thereby out of what money is now paid to those who examine every quarter thirty-three thousand accounts of this money collected by these numerous postmasters scattered throughout the United States under the present law.

Mr. TYNER. One word more. The gentleman refers to the postmaster at New York. It may be true the daily papers which go out from the city of New York are published in such time every morning as to enable the publishers to send them to the post-office to be mailed; but that is not the case in other large cities of the country. I know that in Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and Indianapolis, and in many other localities it has always been the custom of the publishers to send the newspapers directly to the train to be mailed, and not to the post-office.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand that point. The Post-Office Department thinks it is necessary to collect the revenue upon this mail matter, and will make the necessary regulations. If this mail matter has gone without weighing heretofore, they will have to weigh it hereafter if this bill becomes a law. I see no difficulty in it whatever, and neither does the Post-Office Department. The bill meets the approval of practical postal officers, and the Department is satisfied with the machinery.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman yield to me for an amendment?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I cannot yield but for a single question. I am admonished by my chairman that there are other bills of great importance to be reported by the committee, and this is the last chance we will have this session.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make one remark.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will yield for one moment.

Mr. CONGER. The bill provides that if any person shall knowingly and willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act, or procure the same to be done, or if any postmaster or post-office official shall knowingly permit any matter to be mailed without the prepayment of postage as provided in this act, and in violation of the provisions of the same, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less $100 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding three years, one or both, in the discretion of the court.

I submit there is a proposition which may be used against ignorant and innocent persons, or against any person where the complaint shall be made against them, making this a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment of three years. The mailing of a newspaper by an ignorant person contrary to the provisions of this act leaves in the hands of the court the power to punish more severely than for horse-stealing or for many other notorious crimes. I know it says "knowingly or willfully;" but where it is done knowingly it is presumed to be done willfully.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But the bill is no more severe in its penalty than other portions of the postal code. His point is not well taken for a good criminal lawyer. The act provides that it shall be knowingly and willfully done, and if the purpose is to cheat the Department the person so acting ought to punished.

Mr. CONGER. The language is "if any person shall knowingly or willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act," &c.; that is, if he wants to mail it and does mail it he is to be punished.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman if the House will sustain me in the demand for the previous question. I cannot admit any amendment to the bill under instructions from the committee. As other matters are pressing, I will demand the previous question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I want to have it distinctly understood that if the previous question is now ordered there can be no debate and no amendment. Is that so?

The SPEAKER. That would be so.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No debate and no amendment.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 80, noes 54; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 61.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Inasmuch as they have refused explanation or amendment or defense on the part of the people who are to be taxed millions of dollars, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. And pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 59, noes 77.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on ordering the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; and being taken, there were ayes 22; not a sufficient number.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOODFORD. Let me say this: All that the opponents of this bill want is fifteen minutes. Will the House not agree to give that?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEER. I object to debate.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am not proposing to debate.

On the question of ordering tellers on the yeas and nays there were ayes 30.

So (the affirmative being one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. CANNON of Illinois, and Mr. HAWLEY of Connecticut.

Mr. FORT. I understand that the other side want fifteen minutes for debate. I do not suppose that there is any objection to that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] will allow me to say a word, I may perhaps settle this matter. When I was making my remarks I expected to have some time after the previous question was ordered, and I said to several gentlemen that I would accommodate them with a little time. They have been coming to me and accusing me of unfair play. The Lord knows I do not want to strangle any investigation or talk on this bill. And if under the rules of the House fifteen minutes can be given, I would not be so ugly as to refuse it. I do not wish to give any man an opportunity to shake his locks at me and say I had not acted fairly.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to allowing fifteen minutes for debate?

Mr. BURCHARD. Has not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the right to an hour to close debate?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman took his hour before calling the previous question.

Mr. BURCHARD. Did he take the full hour? Has he not a portion of the hour left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, if he desires, can move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. FORT. I hope there will be no objection to fifteen minutes being given for debate.

Mr. STORM. I object to that proposition. There should be half an hour.

Mr. DAWES. What avail fifteen minutes for debate if we cannot offer an amendment? I understand nobody is opposed to the principle of the bill. All that is wanted is an opportunity to offer amendments. I understand that universally the bill is commended.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I was instructed by my committee to allow no amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill if he will so far suspend the operation of the previous question as to allow the motion to strike out the second section?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I cannot do it under the instructions I have from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to admit any amendment; and there is objection to anything being done by unanimous consent. The best way in such cases is to let the rules operate. The tellers will please take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 36.

So (the affirmative being one-fifth of those present) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 73, not voting 106; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO POSTAL CODE.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3603) to amend sections 245, 246, 247, and 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that section 245, section 246, section 247, and section 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder with sureties approved by a postmaster, and, in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and further that he shall perform the said service according to his contract then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.

SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.

SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly or without the exercise of due diligence approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of $5,000 shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of new or modified service, not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds $5,000. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder. And if any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service at such regular letting, who will enter into contract, and perform the same, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high; and in case such next lowest bidder shall refuse to enter into contract and perform the same the Postmaster-General may then award such service and enter into contract with any other person or persons who will duly enter into contract and perform the same at a price not exceeding that bid by such next lowest bidder. And in case of failure thus to secure a contract and the performance of such service as required by law, the Postmaster-General shall proceed in like manner, as soon as practicable, to offer the same to the several bidders at such letting, and also to all other persons competent to contract, at a price not exceeding the prices and sums bid at such letting, in the order of such bids, commencing at the next lowest bid and going up the said list of bids upon such route, unless he shall consider all such bids too high, until he shall secure a proper contract and the satisfactory performance of such service, preferring and giving to each of such bidders, respectively, the right, within such time as the Postmaster-General may designate, to accept such service, and enter into contract for the performance thereof at his or their original bid: Provided, however, That whenever a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: And provided further, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service under the last preceding regular contract thereon.

Mr. PACKER. Mr. Speaker, no one who has given any attention to the frauds practiced upon the Government by means of fictitious or "straw" bidding at the lettings of mail contracts can doubt the propriety, if not the necessity, for some additional legislation to aid the Post-Office Department in its effort to suppress it; and it will require but little explanation to show that the bill proposed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads will close the door against very many at least of the abuses and fraudulent practices by which unscrupulous men have preyed upon the Treasury of the Government, and have sought to enrich themselves at the cost of the people.

From the earliest period in the postal history of the country it has been the policy of the Government to invite competition in bidding at all lettings of mail contracts by advertisement, and to require that the contract should be awarded to the lowest bidder.

Previous to the mail letting of 1871, the practice of the Department had varied in relation to the allotment of contracts where the lowest or accepted bidder made default, some of the Postmasters-General having held that they had the right, under such circumstances, to accept the next lowest bidder willing to perform the service, and to enter into contract with him without readvertising the routes. That construction of the law, however, was regarded by others as being more than doubtful, and while it saved the cost of readvertising, it was found that frequently the Department was met by the allegation that the transportation of the mails could have been secured at lower rates if the route had again been thrown open to competition.

Finding himself thus embarrassed by the conflicting views and variant practice of his predecessors, and confronted by the fact that a considerable number of the bidders for some of the largest mail-routes in the Southwest had failed to execute their contracts, the present vigilant head of the Department asked the opinion of the Attorney-General in relation to his powers and duties in the premises. In response to his inquiries, that officer, upon the 20th day of July, 1871, in an opinion in which he reviewed the several provisions of the acts of 1825, 1836, and 1845, then in force in relation to mail contracts, decided that the Postmaster-General could only make a regular contract after advertisement in the manner prescribed by law, and with the lowest bidder, and that, in the event of the failure of such lowest bidder, the Postmaster-General had no discretion under the law, but was bound to readvertise the route, making temporary contracts to supply the service until a regular letting could take place.

The result and practical operation of this ruling almost necessarily was that upon the large routes, employing a large number of men and stages and hundreds of horses, the other bidders not being bound and almost invariably refusing to accept a contract for less than the regular term of four years, the Department was obliged, in order to continue the service, to make the best terms it could with the former contractor, for he was the only person prepared to perform the work, and no one else would or could afford to purchase the necessary amount of stock for a temporary contract of a few months.

In many cases there is no doubt but these low bids, usually designated as straw bids, were put in in the interest of the old contractors upon the route, who felt morally certain that the temporary contract could only be performed by them; but the bids being regular in form, and the lowest bidder having performed all the prerequisites prescribed by law, was entitled, as the law thus stood and as construed by the law-officer of the Government, to have his bid accepted and the contract awarded to him.

From time to time Congress has endeavored to break up this system and has passed numerous enactments to prevent the repetition of these practices. The ingenuity, however, of the parties engaged in it has devised means to elude many of the provisions which it was hoped would successfully check it, and recent experience shows that some additional legislation is necessary to meet contingencies not fully foreseen and not sufficiently provided for.

One of the restrictions imposed upon bidders by section 245 of the postal code of June 8, 1872, provided—

That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by a written guarantee, signed by one or more responsible persons, and undertaking that, within such time after the bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, the bidder will enter into an obligation, with good and sufficient sureties, to perform the service proposed; and no proposals shall be considered unless accompanied by such guarantee.

But upon this the value of the guarantee is made to depend mainly upon the amount of the bid, and if the bid is small, or more expressively if it is "straw," the guarantee furnishes but little, if any, protection to the Government Experience has shown, too, that among the thirty-five thousand postmasters scattered all over the country, some can be found who will certify to the sufficiency of guarantors, without exercising due care and diligence in making inquiry into the question of their responsibility.

By the bill just reported we require:

That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route, to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and further that he shall perform the said service according to his contract then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond and there shall have been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.

Thus it will be seen that the amount of the bond which is to be substituted in place of the guarantee provided for by the act of 1872 is to be fixed and designated by the Postmaster-Generel in the advertisement of each route; that the sureties are to be approved, where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster holding his commission by appointment from the President, and of the first, second, or third class, and that they are to be bound in the whole penalty of the bond, not only for the execution of the contract by the bidder, but that he shall perform the service according to his contract.

By the amendment to the two hundred and forty-seventh section the bill provides:

That any postmaster who shall affix his signature of the approval of any bond of a bidder or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly or without the exercise of due diligence approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

As an additional measure of protection the committee provide by their amendment of the two hundred and forty-sixth section—

That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate worth in the aggregate a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.

Another of the provisions heretofore relied upon as furnishing additional security and protection was the deposit of a certified check along with the bid. By the act of March 3, 1871, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department, (16 Statutes at Large, page 571,) it was provided:

SEC. 4. That all bidders upon every mail-route for the transportation of mails upon the same shall hereafter accompany their bids (where they exceed $5,000) with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, of some reliable banking house or banking institution, which check or draft shall not be less than 5 per cent. on the amount that they would receive in any one year under such bid. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to enter into good and sufficient bonds to faithfully carry out such contract, such bidder or bidders shall forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States for the use of the Post-Office Department; otherwise such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder to whom it belongs.

Under this section, however, the amount of the certified check or draft was regulated by the amount of the bid, being for but "5 per cent. of the annual pay" designated by the bid; the deposit not being required at all if the bid was lower than $5,000 per annum. The object of the law was therefore practically defeated by the straw bidder either bidding below the $5,000, or making the sum in addition so small that the 5 per cent. would be of no consequence.

The act of 1872 went one step further, however, and provided that bidders, where the annual compensation for the service on the route at the time exceeds $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank for not less than 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on such route at the time the bid is made, and in case of new service for not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of one year's pay proposed in such bids if the bid exceeds $5,000 per annum.

In all cases of new service, then, it will be seen the act of 1872 was as defective as the act of 1871; and when it is remembered that all changes or alterations in the route itself, or in the kind or manner of service employed thereon, brings it within the classification officially regarded as "new service," it will be seen that in a majority of cases its provisions can be evaded in the same manner and just as effectually as were those of the act of 1871.

The bill now before the House requires, it will be seen, that in case of new or modified service the certified check or draft to be deposited shall not be less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid; and as the amount of the bond is to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement for the letting, the amount of the check will be entirely under the control of the Department. That part of the section provides:

That hereafter all bidders upon every mail route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less than 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and in case of new or modified service not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds $5,000. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited shall be returned to the bidder.

The remaining part of this section supplies an omission in the postal code of 1872, by making provision, upon the terms and conditions stated, for making a contract where the contractor, having entered into the contract and commenced the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, afterwards fails or refuses to perform such service. It provides that—

If any regular contractor for the transmission of the mail upon any route shall fail or refuse to perform such service, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service at such regular letting.

These several provisions it is believed, Mr. Speaker, will render many of the irregularities and practices to which these straw-bidders have resorted to overreach the Government impracticable, if not impossible, and will enable the Postmaster-General so to control the lettings of mail contracts that honest bidders will not be at the mercy of these men of straw, and so that, being rid of these fraudulent bids, the Post-Office Department will be able to save thousands of dollars annually to the Treasury.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PACKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION FOR TUESDAY NEXT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent that a session of the House be ordered for Tuesday evening next for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

AMENDMENTS TO POSTAL CODE.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported favorably a bill (H. R. No. 2046) to amend the sixty-third, eightieth, eighty-first, eighty-second, eighty-third, eighty-fourth, and eighty-sixth sections of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, fixing and prescribing the method for adjusting the salaries of postmasters.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the sixty-third, eightieth, eighty-first, eighty-second, eighty-third, eighty-fourth, and eighty-sixth sections of the act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department, approved June 8, 1872, be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 63. That the postmasters, except the postmaster at New York City, whose annual salary is hereby fixed at $6,000, shall be divided into four classes, as follows: The first class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are not more than $4,000 nor less than $3,000; the second class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $3,000 but not less than $2,000; the third class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $2,000 but not less than $1,000; the fourth class shall embrace all postmasters whose annual compensation, exclusive of their commissions on the money-order business of their offices, amounts to less than $1,000.

SEC. 80. That the postmaster at New York City and postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be appointed and may be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices for four years unless sooner removed or suspended according to law; and postmasters of the fourth class shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the Postmaster-General, by whom all appointments and removals shall be notified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

SEC. 81. That the compensation of the postmaster at New York City shall be $6,000 per annum, and the respective compensations of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, assigned in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed, by the Postmaster-General, from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof, for four quarters immediately preceding the adjustment or readjustment, by adding to the whole amount of box rents, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, commissions also not to exceed $2,000 per annum on the other postal revenues of the office, at the following rates, namely: On the first $100 per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $400 per quarter, 50 per cent.; on all over $400 and not over $2,400 per quarter, 40 per cent.; and on all over $2,400 per quarter, 15 per cent. And in order to ascertain the amount of the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to furnish duplicates of their quarterly returns to the Auditor at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case: Provided, That whenever, by reason of the extension of free delivery of letters, the box rents of any post-office are decreased, the Postmaster-General may allow, out of the receipts of such office, a sum sufficient to maintain the salary thereof at the amount at which it had been fixed before the decrease in box rents.

SEC. 82. That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be the box rents collected at their offices, and commissions on other postal revenues of their offices at the rate of 60 per cent. on the first $100 or less per quarter; 50 per cent. on the next $300 or less per quarter; 40 per cent. on the excess above $400 per quarter; the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor in the settlement of the quarterly accounts of such postmasters: Provided, That when the aggregate annual compensation, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, of any postmaster of this class shall amount to $1,000, the Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General, in order that such postmaster may be assigned to his proper class, and his salary fixed as heretofore provided.

SEC. 83. That the salaries of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, except that of the postmaster at New York City, shall be readjusted by the Postmaster-General once in two years, and in special cases as much oftener as he may deem expedient; and when the quarterly returns of any postmaster of the third class show that the salary allowed is 20 per cent. less than it would be on the basis of commission, the Postmaster-General shall readjust the same, on the application in writing by the postmaster, accompanied by a full statement under oath, of the whole revenues of the office, in accordance with his quarterly returns made to the Auditor of the Post-Office Department for at least two quarters immediately preceding such application; and, further, to ascertain and verify the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require the Auditor of the Post-Office Department to furnish him copies of the quarterly returns from any postmaster at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case.

SEC. 84. That the Postmaster-General shall make all orders assigning or changing the salaries of postmasters in writing, and record them in his journal, and notify the change to the Auditor; and any change made in such salaries shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order: Provided, That in cases of not less than 50 per cent. increase or decrease in the business of any post-office, the Postmaster-General may adjust the salary of the postmaster at such office, to take effect from the first day of the quarter or period the returns for which form the basis of readjustment.

SEC. 86. That the Postmaster-General may designate offices at the intersection of mail-routes as distributing or separating offices; and where any such office is of the third or fourth class, he may make a reasonable allowance to the postmaster for the necessary cost of clerical services arising from such duties.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to submit a few words of explanation.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not this bill practically increase the salaries of postmasters, and is it not therefore liable to the point of order which would require its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. If the gentleman will hear me for one moment, he will see that this bill does not increase the salary of a single officer of the Government. The first portion of the bill simply merges the five classes of postmasters as now provided by law into four classes; that is, what are the fourth and fifth classes now are made one class under this bill. The first, second, and third classes are left as they now stand, the postmasters of the first class receiving a salary not exceeding $4,000, of the second class not exceeding $3,000, and of the third class not exceeding $2,000. Those are the classes as they now exist, and include all the officers who receive salaries over $1,000, except the postmaster at New York City, whose salary is fixed by law at $6,000. The first clause of section 80 of the postal code as it now stands is as follows:

That the compensation of postmasters shall be a fixed annual salary to be divided into five classes, exclusive of the postmaster of New York City, whose salary shall be $6,000.

Not a salary is changed in any respect whatever by the provisions of this bill. The advantages of this bill are these: Postmasters are now paid at the rate determined by the amount of stamps canceled at their offices. This bill provides that the annual receipts of the office shall be the measure of compensation. I suppose the wisdom of such a provision as that must be apparent to every gentleman, because it provides a direct accountability on the part of the thirty-three thousand postmasters throughout the country to the head of the Post-Office Department in Washington. As the law now is, the Postmaster-General is unable to determine what number of stamps are canceled at this office or at that, or whether any are canceled at all. In fact there is no direct stream of accountability running between the postmasters of this country, the remotest postmaster in the land, and the Posmaster-General in Washington. If this bill shall become a law, it will make it incumbent upon all postmasters in California, in Indiana, or elsewhere, to account for every dollar's worth of stamps that comes into their hands, for every dollar's worth of stationery and other property of every character. As the law now stands, there have been frequent instances where postmasters have canceled more stamps than have actually been delivered—where the cancelation exceeds the amount of the entire receipts in the office. An instance of that kind came up from Virginia the other day.

Mr. BROMBERG. Does the gentleman assert that there is now no way of ascertaining the amount of stamps coming into the hands of a postmaster?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. You can ascertain that; but you cannot ascertain how many stamps the postmaster cancels. Suppose, for instance, that the gentleman was postmaster of Mobile. It would be impossible by any rule now existing for the Postmaster-General to tell how many stamps he may have canceled as such postmaster.

Mr. BROMBERG. I know that; but is not the salary now adjusted according to the amount of receipts?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. No; that is what this bill does, and is exactly what the law does not do to-day. The last clause of section 83 of the postal code provides:

In order to ascertain the amount of all the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General shall require postmasters to state under oath, at such times and for such purposes as he may deem necessary in each case, the amount of stamps canceled, the amount of box-rent received, the amount of unpaid postage collected, and the amount of postage on printed and other mailable matter.

That is the measure of the compensation of all the postmasters throughout the United States. By this bill, referring to section 72 of the postal code as it now stands, it is provided.

That each postmaster shall render to the Postmaster-General under oath, and in such form as the latter shall prescribe, a quarterly account of all moneys received or charged by him at his office for postage, rent of boxes, or other receptacles for mail matter, or by reason of keeping branch offices or for the delivery of mail matter in any manner whatever.

Here is the starting-point under this bill for the measure of compensation. Tracing it up on page 3 of the present bill, line 19, we find it provided:

And in order to ascertain the amount of the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to furnish duplicates of their quarterly returns to the Auditor at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case.

This is in order to determine the compensation of the postmaster. To-day, in order to determine his compensation, the postmaster swears to the amount of stamps he has canceled; he does not refer to his quarterly returns which show the property for which he is accountable to the Government of the United States.

Now, referring to section 82 of this bill, this is the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class; that is, those whose salaries are less than $1,000. It will be seen that the salaries of these officers are adjusted quarterly in accordance with the work they do; so that the bill is symmetrical in its character. The law is harmonious, and creates an accountability between these officers in the different parts of the country and the source of power here in the capital. The wisdom of the bill it seems to me must be apparent to every gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill, as I understand it, requires postmasters to keep an account of all letters mailed at their offices. Now this will be considerable trouble. How can a postmaster report the number of stamps canceled at his office unless he keeps an account of the number of letters mailed?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. This bill provides no such thing; the gentleman is mistaken; there is no provision of that kind.

Mr. LAWRENCE. How can the postmaster report the number of stamps canceled unless he reports the number of letters mailed?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Is it not perfectly plain to the gentleman that if a postmaster is charged with $100 worth of postage-stamps and at the end of the quarter accounts for only $50, he is responsible for $50 worth of stamps, though he has kept no record of the cancellation?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand that; but this bill fixes the salaries of the postmasters not by the stamps furnished to them, but by the stamps canceled at their office.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. No; their compensation is to be fixed by the stamps sold by them, the box rents, and everything else of that kind. When property is issued to an official he ought to be held responsible for it. This bill proposes to fix the basis of compensation upon that accountability which can be known through the fountain-head of power; not by the oath of the officer to some irregular statement where there is no sufficient accountability.

Mr. LAWRENCE. How is the salary to be regulated?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. By the amount of stamps sold, by the box rents, and by all the receipts of the office.

Mr. PENDLETON. Suppose a party residing at a small town or village should go to the New York City post-office or any other large office, and purchase stamps; what would be the effect upon the smaller post-office at the place where the party resides, the stamps being bought at a first-class office and used at one of a lower class?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. In such a case it would reduce, of course, the salary of the postmaster at the smaller office. But that is an extreme case. Such cases might be supposed under any rule of compensation.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will not this bill allow interested parties to go to other post-offices than their own and purchase stamps to be used at the post-office where they reside, thus benefiting the more remote post-office at the expense of the office through which the matter is mailed?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Certainly that might be done. But if the gentleman will refer to section 72 of the postal code he will see exactly what accountability is created by these quarterly returns of the postmasters, and will see that it is the amount of property for which the postmaster is responsible.

Now let me explain the change as to section 84. It is merely that in cases of less than 50 per cent. increase or decrease in the business of any post-office, the Postmaster-General may adjust the salary of the postmaster at such office. The last section is in harmony with the rest of the bill merging the fourth and fifth classes of postmasters.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether under the present law the salary is not fixed according to the amount of stamps canceled at the office?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. That is the present law exactly; and the only way to determine the accountability is by the oath of the postmaster himself, swearing to the amount of stamps. That provision in the existing law is in fact subornation to perjury on the part of every postmaster in the country. We propose to change the rule by making the actual receipts of the office the measure of compensation. For instance, $100 worth of postage-stamps are issued to a postmaster; if he returns none of those stamps to the Department he will be held responsible for that amount, and his compensation will be fixed accordingly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman will allow me just one suggestion. The standard adopted by the present law—the amount of stamps on letters and newspapers, canceled in the ordinary course of business at any office—does show the amount of business done by that office. But if you fix the salary to make it depend upon the amount of stamps sold at an office, I submit to the gentleman from Kansas fraud will be without limit, and for this reason: the postmaster who is disposed to commit fraud may sell any amount of postage-stamps to anybody who may wish to buy them.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania. The bill is not based on the stamps sold but on those canceled.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. That is the law now.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I believe I understand this bill, and it is as I have stated it. These officers' accounts are adjusted quarterly. If the officer sells $100 worth of stamps this quarter in order to maintain his salary, he has to sell $100 worth of stamps next quarter. These extreme cases presupposed by the gentleman from Illinois do not militate against the proper working of this law at all.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is it proposed to make the salary dependent on the amount of stamps sold?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. On the amount of box rents, the amount of stamps sold, and all property which may come into his hands, as will be shown by the returns made to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But not of stamps canceled.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. But not of stamps canceled at the office of delivery.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. A postmaster doing business at Davenport, Iowa, may go and sell his stamps at Dubuque, Iowa. If active he may send his agents around to sell them, and sell them at a fraction below their face value for the purpose of increasing the amount of business of his office. He may carry that to the extent of thousands and thousands of dollars. He cannot do it now because the amount of compensation is dependent upon the stamps canceled. He has now to swear to the amount of stamps canceled.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The gentleman has presupposed a case in which a postmaster commits an offense against the law as it now exists. That is positively prohibited by statute.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The clerical services, then, depend upon the receipts of the office?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. That is the same as now.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Under this bill a postmaster for the purpose of increasing the amount of sales for a certain period may get his friends to buy stamps enough to last them for six months or a year.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. In answer to the gentleman from Vermont I will say the provision to which he refers is the law as it is now. There is no change in any respect.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. How often is this compensation to be adjusted?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Once in two years in post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, and quarterly if deemed necesary in the fourth class—receipts regulate the adjustment. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NELSON GREEN.

Mr. GARFIELD. A motion to adjourn is now in order.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. PACKER. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads only ask the House to consider one more bill this evening, which is necessary to be passed in order to protect the rights of the Government as well as those of private parties.

Mr. DANFORD, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3609) for the relief of Nelson Green; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Postmaster-General to release Nelson Green, of Bay City, Michigan, a mail contractor on mail-routes numbered 24366, being from Graceton to Au Sable, and 24367, from Alpena to Au Sable, in the said State of Michigan, from the performance of said services.

Mr. SPEER. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

CAPTAIN HURTT'S CASE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, pending the motion to adjourn, laid before the House additional papers in the case of Captain Hurtt; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RETIREMENT OF MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE L. HARTSUFF.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of March 10, 1874, in relation to the retirement of Major-General George L. Hartsuff, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RICHARD H. GARRETT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to the claim of Richard H. Garrett, of Caroline County, Virginia, for the loss of his barn, &c., destroyed at the time Booth and Herold were captured; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE NIAGARA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to House bill No. 2909, to declare the bridge across the Niagara River a post-route.

The SPEAKER. The communication will be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. CONGER. It should go to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Why?

Mr. CONGER. Because the bridge is across a navigable river.

The SPEAKER. It is in reference to the establishment of a post-route. The question of reference is one for the House to decide.

The question being taken on Mr. CONGER'S motion to refer the communication to the Committee on Commerce, it was not agreed to.

The communication was then referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

CONSTRUCTION OF A BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in reference to an appropriation for the construction of a bridge proposed in House bill No. 2178; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PINE TIMBER ON LAPSED RAILROAD GRANTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to the resolution of the House of May 28, 1874, in relation to pine timber on lands included within forfeited or lapsed railroad grants; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

KANSAS INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask that by unanimous consent a clerical error in a bill passed this morning, the bill (H. R. No. 3528) providing for the sale of Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, may be corrected. I desire that the words in the first section "or within six months after the date of the approval of a new appraisement when made" be stricken out.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CREEK INDIANS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. No. 3610) to carry out the treaty with the Creek Nation of Indians of March 24, 1832; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I give notice that on Monday I shall move to suspend the rules to enable me to report from the Committee on the Territories, and to put upon its passage, the bill to enable the people of Colorado to form a State government.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to give notice that on Monday, as requested by many gentlemen, I propose to call for a vote on what is known as the redistribution bill, which has been pending for several Mondays past.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I give notice that on Monday I shall move to suspend the rules and pass the bill relating to the commissioners of claims.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I give notice that on Monday I will ask the House to proceed with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, to the exclusion of all other business.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPEER that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 32, noes 46.

Mr. DANFORD. I hope the House will dispose of the bill for the relief of Nelson Green. It will take but a few minutes.

Mr. SPEER. That bill should have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a bill to release a Government contractor.

Mr. SENER. I demand tellers on the motion to adjourn. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. The vote of a quorum is not necessary to adjourn.

Mr. SENER. It takes a quorum to do business.

The SPEAKER. Adjourning is not business.

Mr. SENER. But the next thing will be business.

The SPEAKER. It will be sufficient then to raise the question of the presence of a quorum if it is proposed to do business without a quorum.

Mr. SENER. I will.

Mr. COOKE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEER. It is evident there is no quorum, and no bill will pass this afternoon without a quorum.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 24, noes 60.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote on the motion to adjourn having shown the absence of a quorum, there is nothing in order but a call of the House.

Mr. SPEER. Then I will move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. PACKER. If my colleague [Mr. SPEER] will listen to the explanation of my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] I think that he will see that this bill is not objectionable. And if it is to be passed at all and to be of any service to the parties, it is necessary, for the interests of the Government as well as of these parties, that it should be passed previous to the 1st day of July. The allegation is that this party put in his bid under a misapprehension. If it is not a good and valid bid, then the Government can hold the next bidder, and if they are to hold the next bidder to his bid, they should have an opportunity of doing so before the date I have named.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask my colleague, for whom I have a very sincere respect, whether this is not the only bill of this kind which his committee has reported this session, and whether they have not refused to take cognizance of bills of a similar character by sending them back and having them referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Claims?

Mr. PACKER. Not at all. The gentleman misapprehends the character of this claim. It is not to release a mail contractor, but it is to release a party from a bid which he put in under misapprehension. He was misled by a statement made by the postmaster whom he employed to make out his bid, and relying on the accuracy of his statement signed a bid to carry a mail over a route he had not intended to bid for.

Mr. SPEER. Does he lose anything by this?

Mr. BELL. I object to debate.

Mr. HOSKINS. Pending the call of the House, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THURMAN presented resolutions of the board of trade of Toledo, Ohio, in favor of the renewal of reciprocal trade relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT presented a memorial of manufacturers and dealers in tobacco of the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the tariff bill with its present provisions regarding the sale of tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Andrew Mason, melter and refiner at the assay office in New York, praying compensation for two improvements made by him in the mode of parting gold and silver bullion; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, presented the memorial of John J. Bagley & Co., and 11 other firms, of Detroit, Michigan, manufacturers of and dealers in cigars, smoking and chewing tobacco and leaf tobacco, remonstrating against the passage of an act permitting growers of leaf tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to the consumer without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I present the petition of John W. Grantham and 48 others, citizens of Jefferson County, West Virginia, asking that the tax on national banks and State banks be equalized. I regard this as a step in the right direction, and call the special attention of the Finance Committee to this petition, to whom I move that it be referred.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented a memorial of manufacturers of plug, fine-cut, chewing, and smoking tobacco, &c., citizens of Danville, Pittsylvania County, Virginia, protesting against the passage of the law permitting growers of leaf tobacco to sell $100 worth of their crop at retail to consumers without license or tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. I present the petition of John B. Thomas. I will state that this case has already been before the Committee on Claims and reported adversely, but the papers are now accompanied by a large mass of additional testimony. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SCOTT. I would ask the Senator from Missouri whether there is a petition setting forth in what the additional testimony consists? If not, the case is not within the forty-ninth rule and the papers ought not to be recommitted.

Mr. BOGY. I cannot answer the question. A large mass of papers accompanies the petition and contains additional testimony.

Mr. SCOTT. I must object to the recommittal unless the rule is complied with; for claimants against whom adverse reports are made, if this practice be tolerated, have nothing to do but to add one more paper to a voluminous mass and send the case back to the committee. I shall have to object to the reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects to the reference on the ground that there is no petition for a rehearing and setting forth the new testimony, as is required by the rule.

Mr. BOGY. I ask that the papers be returned to me again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be returned to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BOGY presented the memorial of P. P. Pitchlynn, delegate of Choctaw Nation of Indians, upon the right of that nation to be paid the money awarded to it by the United States Senate on the 9th day of March, A. D. 1859; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a protest of the president, councilors, and people of the Seneca Nation of Indians, made in their national council, against the passage of House bill No. 3680, to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease their lands within the Cattaraugus and Alleghany reservations and to confirm existing leases; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALCORN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in relation to the claim of R. W. Edmondston be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Andrew Mason be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask that the Senate will, after the close of the morning business, permit me to call up the bill (S. No. 154) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain tribes of Indians in the northern superintendency," approved June 10, 1872, which was under consideration on Thursday and went over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall have to insist on going on with the unfinished business. I think it will take but a few minutes.

DARIEN SURVEYS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that an order may be entered to distribute twenty copies of the report of Commander Selfridge on the surveys of the Isthmus of Darien to the Smithsonian Institution for foreign exchange. We have them here at the document-room, and we shall reap a rich gain in return. I move that the order be made.

The motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL MEDALS.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one-hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence, have had the same under consideration and have instructed me to report it with an amendment. I should like to have the bill considered now, as it is very brief.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That medals, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence be prepared at the Mint at Philadelphia for the centennial board of finance, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1873, upon the payment of a sum not less than the cost thereof; and all the provisions, whether penal or otherwise, of such coinage act against the counterfeiting or imitating the coins of the United States shall apply to the medals struck and issued under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH AT SALT LAKE.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 677) to incorporate the First Presbyterian church of Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it with an amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was in line 15, section 1, after the word "effects," to insert "not to exceed in amount $100,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOLDING OF COURTS.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 460) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871, to report the same back with two amendments. This is a bill that it is very necessary should be passed in order to prevent a failure of the circuit courts being held, and I ask that it may be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 3 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871, so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the circuit judge in each judicial circuit, whenever in his judgment the public interest shall so require, to designate and appoint, in the manner and with all the powers provided in the act to provide for holding the courts of the United States in case of the sickness or other disability of the judges of the district courts, approved July 29, 1850, the district judge of any judicial district within his circuit to hold a district or circuit court in the place or aid of any other district judge within the same circuit; and it shall be the duty of such district judge as shall be for that purpose designated and appointed to hold the district or circuit court as aforesaid without any other compensation than his regular salary as established by law and his necessary personal expenses incurred by him at the place where such court shall be held, not exceeding the rate of ten dollars per day for the time of holding such court and his necessary traveling expenses in going to and returning from such place; of which expenses he shall make out an itemized bill and make oath to the same, which, after being approved by the district judge of the district where the court shall be held or the circuit judge, shall be paid as part of the expenses of the Department of Justice: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the payment of other traveling expenses of judges of the Federal courts.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was in line 8, after the words "duty of," to insert "the proper justice of the Supreme Court or;" so as to read:

It shall be the duty of the proper justice of the Supreme Court or the circuit judge in each judicial circuit, whenever in his judgment the public interest shall so require, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. What does that mean? Who is "the proper justice of the Supreme Court?"

Mr. THURMAN. The one assigned to that circuit.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not say, as it seems to me it should be, "the justice of the Supreme Court assigned to that circuit?"

Mr. THURMAN. There cannot be any doubt about it.

Mr. CONKLING. I think I am the average man who knows so little about it that I am a fair example of what people who are ignorant may understand by this bill. I did not, I confess, when I heard it read, know what that expression meant. If it means the judge assigned to that circuit, then it is so easy to say so that I suggest to the Senator, without meaning to interfere with the bill, that it would be well to change the language to express what is meant.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think there can be any trouble about it.

The next amendment was in line 26, to strike out the words "and make oath to the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. L. STEPHENSON.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of C. L. Stephenson, of Virginia, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, to report a bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to have the bill put on its passage. It will only take a minute.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 906) to relieve C. L. Stephenson, of Virginia, of his political disabilities was read three times, and passed.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3359) fixing the time for the election of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania to the Forty-fourth Congress, to report it back without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the present consideration of that bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that on the Tuesday next following the first Monday in November, 1874, there shall be elected in each congressional district in the State of Pennsylvania one Representative to represent that State in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANDAMUS PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus, to report it back with some amendments and with the recommendation that it pass. I should like to have it considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that all proceedings in mandamus, in any of the courts of the United States, wherein any officer of the United States is made a party defendant, but who may die, resign, or be removed from office before the final determination of such proceedings, may be continued in the name of his successor in office, and such proceedings may be had as in case of the death of a party defendant during the pending of a suit at law in the proper court; and the proceedings in mandamus shall proceed to a hearing at the same term, unless for good cause shown the court shall continue the case; and if a peremptory writ shall be awarded, the same shall and may be directed to any successor in office to such person who may have so resigned, been removed, or died.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out after the word "may," in line 7, the words "be continued in the name of his," and insert "for the purposes of justice be revived against his."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as new sections the following:

SEC. 2. That the circuit courts of the United States shall have, and are hereby given, power to issue the writ of mandamus in all causes at law or in equity of which they have jurisdiction, and in which such a writ by the common or the chancery law is an appropriate remedy, or by way of original proceeding where such writ is necessary to any jurisdiction possessed by said court and is a proper remedy.

SEC. 3. That this act shall have effect from the day of its passage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ERRORS IN PRIZE-LISTS.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (S. No. 907) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the bill be put on its passage. Indeed, it has already passed the Senate at this session, but it was coupled with a second section. The House agreed to our bill striking out the first section, and we concurred in their action. Now the committee desire to send this first section of the bill by itself. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in all cases where corrections in the distribution of prize-money have or may become necessary, and in all cases where the names of parties entitled to share in prizes have been or may by error be omitted from the prize-lists, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to correct and pay the same, the former upon the principle that the provisions of the act in force at the date of final adjudication govern distribution, and the latter to receive their proportion of the prizes claimed the same as all others of like rank and pay who may have been paid, said payments to be made out of the naval pension fund.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What class of errors does this bill refer to? Errors made by officers of the Government?

Mr. SARGENT. The chairman of the committee will explain.

Mr. CRAGIN. It frequently happens that names are omitted by mistake. Sailors and others were taken prisoners and held at Andersonville and other places, and their names did not appear on the prize-list. The bill relates to that class of claims where names were omitted by mistake. The Secretary of the Navy has written a letter on the subject, which I have in my desk and which was read when the bill passed before. It will take but very little money, and it comes out of the naval pension fund. It is only to pay cases where there was a mistake, in omitting names.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand it does not enlarge the class of beneficiaries; but some persons, owing to the circumstances named by the chairman, were omitted who were most meritorious, and they should be saved from the effect of their shares lapsing to the Government.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me that there ought to be some limitation to the claims that may be made under the general head of errors without specifying by whom committed.

Mr. SARGENT. There might be a limitation of time, that the claim shall be made within six months. The original laws limit the class. I have no objection to a limit of time by the Senator.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is a pretty large power. It is taking money assigned for one purpose and appropriating it to another.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and to ask to have it considered now.

Mr. WEST. I do not desire particularly to object to this bill of the Senator from Vermont, but we have already passed four bills this morning immediately on their being presented by committees, and the Calendar is standing still. I do not think the business which is reported this morning should have any particular preference over that reported heretofore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object?

Mr. WEST. I am constrained to object on that ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a western judicial district of North Carolina," reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred sundry memorials of citizens of North Carolina in reference to a change of the boundaries of the judicial districts in that State, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific Railroad Companies, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2246) relating to circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama, reported it with an amendment.

No. 550) to reorganize and fix the time for holding United States district courts for the State of Alabama; the bill (S. No. 199) relating to the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of Alabama; and the bill (S. No. 515) to change the time for holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the southern district of Alabama, reported adversely thereon, the subject being covered by House bill No. 2246; and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3573) making additions to the fifteenth section of the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," have had the same under consideration and instructed me to report it back without amendment, and I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to it.

Mr. BOGY. I should like to have that bill passed at the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I object.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not to-day. I would rather it should lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 635) authorizing M. P. Turner and his associates and assigns to prospect for and mine coal and other minerals in and under the beds of the Des Moines and Coon Rivers, in Polk County, Iowa, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 803) to incorporate the Columbia Metallurgical Company, to develop and utilize gold, silver, and improved iron by a new patent process, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 808) for the better protection of immigrants, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2655) to provide for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States, and to promote the efficiency of the life-saving service, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 867) to correct a clerical error in the act granting the right of way through the public lands to the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 753) providing for the settlement and payment of the damages arising from the seizure and detention of the steam ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla by the authorities of the United States in 1861, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate to report whether under the existing laws a promotion to the rank of rear-admiral can be lawfully made without a previous examination of the officer promoted according to the provisions of the act of Congress on the subject of promotion, approved July 16, 1862, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 591) granting the right of way to the Seattle and Walla-Walla Railroad Transportation Company, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Trumbull Hayden, setting forth the condition of affairs in the Territory of Arizona in respect to the Indians therein, and praying for reform in the management and government of the Indians, and that the disloyal of them be placed under the supervision of the Army police, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 871) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back without amendment and request that it be put on its passage.

Mr. WEST. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. This bill has been here four or five months. It is very important to the Department of War that it should pass, and it is at the request of General Belknap that it is urged now. It will meet with no opposition and merely grants the right of way on the public lands.

Mr. WEST. It is unnecessary for the Senator to explain the object of the bill. I call attention to the fact that there are six hundred cases on this Calendar, and I am not inclined to give preference to any one.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1200) for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia.

Mr. ALCORN. I have a report to make from a committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Until reports from committees are made, I must object to the consideration of any bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are still in order.

Mr. ALCORN. The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 720) conferring the right to construct a tunnel through the White Pine Mountain, State of Nevada, and to purchase public lands contiguous thereto, have had the same under consideration and instructed me to report it back with amendments. I ask that it be considered now.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Not after I have made a report. I object until I make several reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot receive a qualified objection.

Mr. WEST. I make a standing objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows:

Provided, That no artificial limbs or commutation therefor shall be furnished to such persons as shall be entitled to pensions under this act.

And also add the following as an additional section, namely:

TOTALLY DISABLED PENSIONERS.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 735) to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who have been totally disabled, having met, after full and free conference have agreed and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: Strike out the word "constant" in line 3 of Senate amendment and substitute the word "regular" therefor; and strike out the word "constant" in line 12 of the Senate amendment and insert the word "regular" therefor, and add as an additional section as follows:

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect from and after the 4th day of June, 1874.

And the Senate agree to the same.

D. D. PRATT,
JOHN J. INGALLS,
M. C. HAMILTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. M. RUSK,
W. B. SMALL,
W. S. HOLMAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the present method of distributing the laws of the United States, and to report what changes, if any, are necessary.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that the words "publishing and" be inserted before the words "distributing the laws of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that amendment will be made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the subject of publishing the laws belongs to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I think it is a fair question for the Committee on the Judiciary to decide whether they could not be just as well printed in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. ANTHONY. The subject of publishing the Statutes at Large is already before the Committee on the Judiciary, and this is a resolution in relation to the distribution of the number provided for in the bill that we had under discussion on Friday.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all right, but I desire to amend it so as to make it clear.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept the amendment.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to take up House bill No. 3237. It is a very short bill, merely changing the name of a bank, and will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3237) to authorize The First National Bank of Seneca to change its name.

The bill provides that the name of "The First National Bank of Seneca," located in the city of Morris, county of Grundy, Illinois, shall be changed to the "First National Bank of Morris" whenever the board of directors of the bank shall accept the new name, by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of the resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency; but such acceptance is to be made within six months.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURETIES OF JESSE J. SIMKINS.

Mr. LEWIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1200, for the relief of the sureties of the late Jesse J. Simkins, collector of the port of Norfolk, Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand that that bill has been taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to its consideration?

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Virginia that that bill was before the Committee on the Judiciary at one time and reported adversely, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] I know is desirous of being present when it shall be considered. He is detained in his house to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. This bill has been reported favorably, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WRIGHT. I was nearly through with my statement, and I prefer not to yield at the present time. The Senator from Vermont is detained in his house to-day by illness and was not able to attend the meeting of the committee this morning, and I know he is desirous of being present when this bill is considered. I therefore hope that the Senator from Virginia will not press the bill at this time, or if he does, that the Senate will not take it up.

Mr. LEWIS. I understand that this bill has been reported favorably by a committee of this body and it has passed the House of Representatives. It is a case of peculiar hardship, and I am sure the Senate would not object to passing the bill if they knew all the circumstances as I do.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the title of the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. It is a bill for the relief of the sureties of Jesse J. Simkins, who was compelled to pay over certain moneys to the confederate government and had no power to refuse to do it. This is simply an act for relief, which has passed the House of Representatives and been recommended by a committee of this body.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a history connected with that bill not known to the Senator from Virginia alone. Whenever it comes up, it will be the subject of some discourse. Inasmuch as I believe everything that Senator says, I am bound to believe the Senate would like to pass the bill in view of the facts. However, I should feel more firmly persuaded upon that point if the Senate, if it ever should pass this bill, were to do so after a knowledge of the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia insist upon his motion?

Mr. LEWIS. I will not insist upon it after the remarks made by the two Senators, but will allow it to go over until to-morrow

DISTRICT COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. WEST. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. No. 88) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana.

Mr. BOGY. I object to the bill being taken up out of its regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the motion to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Before the motion is put I wish to say to the Senate that I think some consideration should be given to the position which I occupy here, being the sole representative in this body from the State of Louisiana. This is a bill relating particularly to the organization of United States courts in that district, and it is the only bill I have asked the Senate to consider at this session.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator objected to a bill a short time ago which it would not have taken two minutes to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Louisiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

For the more convenient transaction of business in the courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana, the bill proposes to divide the State into two judicial districts. The parishes of Rapides, Grant, Natchitoches, Sabine, De Soto, Caddo, Bossier, Red River, Bienville, Winn, Webster, Claiborne, Jackson, Lincoln, Union, Morehouse, Richland, Ouachita, Caldwell, Catahoula, Franklin, Tensas, Madison, and Carroll are to compose one district, to be called the northern district of Louisiana, and the remaining part of the State is to compose another district, to be called the eastern district of Louisiana; and all criminal actions or civil suits, either in law or equity, which have arisen in the northern district, or against persons therein, or concerning lands situated therein, together with all process, writs, or recognizances, and records belonging thereto, are to be transferred to the northern district; and all civil suits hereafter instituted against persons residing in the northern district, or suits concerning lands situated in the same, in the courts of the United States, are to be in that district; and there are to be held annually in the district two stated sessions of the court, at Monroe, on the first Mondays of May and November in each year; and a person learned in the law, who shall reside in the northern district, is to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, judge thereof, with a salary of $4,500 per annum, payable semi-annually, with the same powers and duties as the district judge of the United States for the district of Louisiana as it now exists, and such as are conferred upon him or required of him by this act, who is required to hold the terms, and authorized and required to hold special sessions of the court in the northern district, for the trial of civil and criminal cases, whenever he may deem it expedient. All processes, writs, and recognizances of every kind, whether respecting juries, witnesses, bail, or otherwise, which relate to cases to be tried at the special sessions, are to be considered as belonging to the sessions in the same manner as if they had been issued or taken with reference thereto. Any special session may be adjourned to any time or times previous to the next stated meeting of the district court for the district. All business pending for trial at any special court at the close thereof is to be considered as of course removed to the next stated term of the court. The district court in the northern district is to perform all the duties and possess all the powers of circuit courts of the United States for the State of Louisiana, except in cases of appeal and writs of error; and the judge is authorized to appoint a clerk of the court in the northern district, who is to reside and keep the records of the court at that place, and receive for the services performed by him the same fees and compensation that are allowed to the clerk of the court holding its sessions in New Orleans, and be subject in every respect to the same restrictions and responsibilities. The district court for the eastern district is to be held in New Orleans as heretofore, and it is to be the duty of the clerks of the district and circuit courts of the United States in New Orleans to transmit by some safe conveyance, or deliver to the clerks of the northern district, or to their order, the original papers in all such cases as properly belong to the court in the northern district by the provisions of this act, together with a transcript of the proceedings had therein.

The second section authorizes the President of the United States, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, to appoint one person as marshal and one as district attorney for the northern judicial district of Louisiana, created by this act; and the terms of appointment and service, together with the duties and responsibilities of the marshal and district attorney, respectively, for the district are to be in all respects the same within their district, as to the terms of appointment and services, the duties and responsibilities of the marshal and district attorney respectively, of the present district of Louisiana; and the marshal is to receive such fees and emoluments as are received by the marshal of the United States for the State of Louisiana; and the attorney is to receive an annual compensation of $250, and the same fees and emoluments as are allowed to the attorney of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was in section 1, line 13, to strike out "eastern" and insert "southern."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 14 to strike out the words "criminal actions or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "all," in line 18, to insert "criminal suits for offenses committed in said northern district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "residing," in line 20, to insert the words "or found."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 29, after the words "salary of," to strike out "$4,500" and insert "$3,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "cases," in line 36, to strike out the following words:

Whenever he may deem it expedient; that all processes, writs, and recognizances of every kind, whether respecting juries, witnesses, bail, or otherwise, which relate to cases to be tried at said special sessions, shall be considered as belonging to said sessions in the same manner as if they had been issued or taken with reference thereto; that any special session may be adjourned to any time or times previous to the next stated meeting of the district court of said districts; that all business pending for trial at any special court shall, at the close thereof, be considered as of course removed to the next stated term of the court.

And in lieu thereof to insert,

As provided by law for other districts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 54, after the word "allowed," to insert the words "by law," and in line 55 to strike out the word "said," before "court," and insert "the district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 58 to strike out the word "eastern," before "district," and insert "southern."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 13, to strike out the words "received by" and insert "provided by law," and in line 14 to strike out the words "for the State," and insert "in the present district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 17 of section 2, after the word "allowed," to insert the words "by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I was not in the Judiciary Committee when this bill was agreed upon and am not, therefore, familiar with its provisions. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Louisiana whether the bill transfers the present judge of the district court in Louisiana to the northern district.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. BAYARD. Does not this bill provide for the formation of an additional district?

Mr. WEST. It provides for the reinstitution of a district that lapsed during the war.

Mr. BAYARD. Were there two districts in Louisiana before the war?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir; but the northern part of the State being occupied by the enemy the court lapsed, and then one district court did all the business under a statute of 1863.

Mr. BAYARD. Does this bill cause the appointment of an additional judge and the additional machinery pertaining to a separate court?

Mr. WEST. It does. The facts, as presented to the Judiciary Committee, satisfied them of the economy of such a proceeding, inasmuch as the expense of bringing litigants and their witnesses and serving process at a distance of five hundred miles more than counteracts the cost of the machinery here provided; and the salary of the judge is fixed at a very small amount.

Mr. BAYARD. It will appear then that all the judicial machinery for a separate court, with a judge, a clerk, a separate marshal, separate deputies, separate officials, is created by this bill and at very great expense, and for what? For whom? A community that number considerably less than a million people. We all know that the business of Louisiana as a bulk lies in the southern portion of the State. The city of New Orleans contains the commercial interests of the State as a bulk, and the upper portion of the State has very little business comparatively speaking. I scarcely think that this is the time, when the country is in so much pecuniary distress, for the multiplication of offices, the increase of expenses, the expansion as I must consider unnecessarily of the United States jurisdiction. I was not aware that it was proposed. I know that two years ago there was a regular crop of district judges proposed all over the country, and almost every State was proposed to be divided into two or three or more districts for the purpose of creating new judges who hold their tenure for life. In the present case I only say that I do not desire to see a bill passed which shall create a new district and a new judge with all the new and expensive machinery that must necessarily attend it. God knows we have enough Federal officers now in the country without creating a double set in the State of Louisiana.

The efficiency of the present officers in the State of Louisiana has been rather sadly developed before the country of late, and from the specimens we have had there and the part they have taken in the government of that State in the last few years, I do not think the people of this country would be very glad to see them multiplied.

For that reason I shall call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask whether this bill affects any other State than Louisiana in any form?

Mr. WEST. This bill affects only Louisiana, and it establishes a court in a district that, contrary to what the Senator from Delaware says, has largely increased. It has a town in it becoming a large railroad center, and it takes as long to go from the center of the new judicial district to New Orleans as it takes to go from New Orleans to New York. We have not railroad facilities in our State, and our litigants are obliged in some cases to go five hundred miles and spend three or four days to get to the present court. All these matters have been weighed properly by the Judiciary Committee and they have decided in favor of the bill. As for the increase of judicial districts throughout the country, this is the second bill that has been acted on during my experience in the Senate, now nearly four years.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Hamilton of Maryland, Johnston Kelly, Merrimon, Norwood, and Saulsbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Brownlow, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gordon, Hager, Hamlin, Jones, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Ransom, Robertson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Wadleigh—29.

So the bill was passed.

CIRCUIT COURT IN THE NINTH CIRCUIT.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask leave to make a report from a committee at this time, and I will say in making it that the bill reported is a bill changing the time of holding the courts of the Pacific coast and nothing else. It concerns the convenience of the judges that it should pass at once. It can be read in a moment, and if there be no objection I ask to put it on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 881) fixing the times of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides hereafter a term of the circuit court of the United States for the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada shall be held as follows: For the district of California, in the city of San Francisco, on the second Monday of March, July, and November of each year; for the district of Oregon, in the city of Portland, on the second Monday of April, August, and December of each year; and for the district of Nevada, in the city of Carson, on the second Monday of February, June, and October of each year.

Amendments were reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

In line 9 strike out "December" and insert "November," and in line 11 strike out "February" and insert "March;" so as to read:

For the district of Oregon, in the city of Portland, on the second Monday of April, August, and November of each year; and for the district of Nevada, in the city of Carson, on the second Monday of March, June, and October of each year.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the bill (H. R. No. 3431) authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona no longer required for military purposes, which was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to be recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired the Senate resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 857) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise for the purpose of moving that the Senate postpone the regular order and take up House bill No. 3171, commonly called the moiety bill. I desire to state that I do not know that the bill will take very long and I think it ought to be considered now. It has been postponed for several days. I move now to take it up and hope it will be disposed of promptly. I submit the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the moiety bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not. The bill we had under consideration on Friday is now almost completed, and I suppose it can be disposed of in ten minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it? Is that the printing bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. The printing bill. I do not wish to speak over three minutes on it, unless I am provoked by remarks of other Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the moiety bill can be taken up after that is disposed of, I have no objection. I supposed that bill had passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

Mr. WEST. In this difference of opinion between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Rhode Island, I must stand between them and not permit the Senate to make any such arrangement, and shall insist upon the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the Post-Office Appropriation bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. That the Senator can test by a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit to whatever the majority say. I do not want to interfere with a bill nearly completed which can be disposed of in ten or fifteen minutes. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. WEST. I shall ask for a vote of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask what is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the bill (S. No. 857) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof.

Mr. WINDOM. How did the resolution of which I had charge become displaced? It was yielded only temporarily. I will read the order of the President on Friday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true; but the bill which the Chair has just referred to was the unfinished business when the Senate last adjourned, and the rule is inexorable. If the Senator from Minnesota had called up his resolution before the adjournment on Friday, it would have been the unfinished business; but as he did not, the business under consideration when the Senate adjourned under the rule was the unfinished business and must now be called up.

Mr. WINDOM. If that is the rule, I have nothing to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. As soon as the present bill is disposed of I will move to take up the moiety bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire now to make the proposition to the Senate that I made once before, and which was agreed to, and although agreed to unanimously was disagreed to practically afterward, and that is that I may have a day for the Military Committee. I am willing to take Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday; but I want the Senate to give the Committee on Military Affairs a day this week for many reasons. We have had no time and no opportunity to have any of our bills passed for the reason that other committees which are more important—and when I say that I mean it—have had the time accorded to them. I ask the Senate to give the Military Committee one day this week. We want it for the benefit of the committee and the benefit of those who have bills pending, and also for another reason. I do not expect to be here more than two or three days longer, and it is very desirable that the committee I represent should have an opportunity to be heard before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Wednesday of this week, after the expiration of the morning hour, the Senate proceed to consider bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That of course will be taken always subject to the general reservation in favor of appropriation bills. I will say to the Senator for his encouragement that no appropriation bill will be in his way on Wednesday or Thursday, I think.

Mr. LOGAN. As far as appropriation bills are concerned, they always come up anyhow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not desire to make any further remarks.

Mr. LOGAN. I have attempted this once or twice and got such an order once, but was overruled the other day very unceremoniously; and I hope that this day if it is given to the committee will be observed by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not disagree to the proposition of the Senator from Illinois because I think it is reasonable; but I do it with the expectation that the Senate will take up next the moiety bill; and if Senators understood the pressure that is brought to bear upon me and other Senators in regard to it they would see the propriety of my course.

Mr. LOGAN. I gave way the other day, even at the time I made the request; when the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Minnesota both suggested important measures they had charge of, I said I would yield to those two measures. Now, I will do everything I can to facilitate the taking up of either of the propositions so that the Senate may act upon them, but I want a day fixed certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not make any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that it is unanimously consented that on Wednesday next, after the expiration of the morning hour, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Is that understanding correct? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to give notice that after the consideration of the bill reported by the Senator from Rhode Island I will press the resolution which was almost completed the other day before, by my consent, this bill was taken up for half an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will decide that.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 857) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents, and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill was reported to the Senate on Friday last. I move that the order reporting it to the Senate be rescinded, as I wish to move a few verbal amendments which in the haste of making the amendments at the desk were overlooked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered as still in Committee of the Whole. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section 4, line 86, after the words "Supreme Court" I move to insert the words "and five sets for the use of the Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section [11] 9, line 4, after the words "Congressional Printer" the words "when requested to do so by the Secretary of State" should be inserted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section [12] 10, line 3, the word "such" should be "any;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the Congressional Printer, at the request of the Secretary of State, to print and bind any number, not exceeding three thousand copies, of the annual report on commerce and navigation, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section [13] 11, in line 3, and also in line 5, the word "such" should be changed to "any."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The last section of the bill, section 18, should be inserted on page 16 after section [13] 11.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) That change will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. The other day I offered an amendment which is on the Clerk's table, which I ask to have read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That each Senator and member of the House of Representatives shall have the same number and kind of books and documents now allowed by law to each, and that the franking privilege be, and the same is hereby, restored so far only as to allow Senators and members of the House of Representatives to send such books and documents to the people.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina and ask him to accept an amendment including the seeds such as are distributed by the Agricultural Department, to come in at the proper place.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, this bill was proposed for the purpose of correcting some abuses that had grown up in the official distribution of documents. The bill throughout has been in the interest of a more economical administration of the public printing, and all the amendments that were made on Friday up to the last one were made in that direction, and the committee were voted down repeatedly because they had called for a larger or a looser distribution of the documents than the Senate thought proper, to all of which amendments we cheerfully submitted. Then came the amendment to print three hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report and to send it free through the mail; in other words, to revive the franking privilege. If it be the judgment of the Senate to revive the franking privilege, of course I have no disposition to delay it and no power to prevent it; but I hope it will be done in a bill by itself, boldly, frankly, and upon its own merits; that it will not be put upon a bill of this kind; that we shall not here in a bill that is intended to reform the distribution of documents printed for our own use and for the use of the Executive Departments repeal the abolition of the franking privilege as regards one document or as regards any number of documents.

Mr. BAYARD. I think it would puzzle the Senator from Rhode Island to have anything much bolder and franker than he had in the vote of the Senate on the subject of the Agricultural Report. I think the vote, after a very open discussion, was 34 to 19. The vote by which the Senate adopted the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] was exceedingly bold and exceedingly frank. There was no doubt about it at all. I think that vote was the expression of a great deal of disgust on the part of the Senate for the manner in which this franking question had been treated from the beginning to the end. It was a business question of very large and practical importance, and I beg leave to say that in my opinion it never did receive from the Senate that kind of consideration, if we are to judge from the discussion that attended it, which the Senate was entitled to. It was miserably treated. It was a question of great practical importance, in which the country had been grossly misled and deceived, chiefly by the action of the Post-Office Department. A "reform" had been puffed into existence which was not based upon an actual popular demand or popular necessity. The people of this country were led to believe that the Post-Office Department was prevented from being a self-sustaining Department of the Government simply by reason of the public documents sent through it and the letters that passed free under the franks of officers of the Government, among whom were members of Congress. We were assured that the deficits in the Post-Office Department were caused by the franking, and the franking done by members of Congress was made especially prominent as the cause of complaint and clamor.

What was the truth? What were the actual facts? Let the experience of the last year show—the deficit has been greater than ever before. We went on, however, printing public documents at a vast expense without providing the least machinery for their distribution. They are lying down in the vaults of this building and rotting there because no means have been provided for circulating them among the people for whom it was pretended they were intended.

Now, here comes a document of very general appreciation. I do not speak of its value, for I am not a farmer, and what little I do know about farming does not lead me to value particularly the Agricultural Report; but still it is certainly a document of very general acceptability. We all of us have large and numerous applications for this document. A proposition is made that the usual number of this document—for three hundred thousand copies are not in excess of the usual number ordered—shall be printed, and that it shall pass to the public at large without any frank other than the Government stamp which shall secure it free passage through the mails. That was a distinct, plain proposition, made by the Senator from Kentucky, and indorsed by a vote of the Senate of more than two to one.

I will agree thus far with the Senator from Rhode Island, that the question of printing these public documents at all is one that is entitled to separate consideration. It may very well be doubted whether the cost to the people is not much greater than the advantage to the people; and yet that question has never been discussed. No one has ever thrown any light on that subject in the Senate that I have been aware of, but we have just gone on printing documents as usual, without providing any machinery for their distribution. Now the proposition comes to let the mails of the United States, the post-routes of the United States, the machinery provided at the expense of the United States, by law to be utilized to the extent of permitting the people of the country to receive a very generally accepted public document without cost. There is no privilege in that to a member of Congress. He simply has to go to the trouble or expense, as the case may be, of indorsing upon the back of this document the name of the party who is to receive it. It must be directed to somebody, and that expense and trouble will be for the member of Congress to consider.

Mr. SARGENT. Is not the Senator aware that the amendment now pending relates to all public documents?

Mr. BAYARD. O, no; the Senator from Rhode Island was speaking of the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, by which the Agricultural Report was ordered to the extent of three hundred thousand copies to be sent with a simple stamp upon it through the mails free to all persons to whom the members of the Senate and House might direct. I understand he objects to that, and he wants all measures looking to a free dissemination of the documents kept out of this bill. I do not see why it should be so. I do not see why the ameliorations to the bill should not be ingrafted upon it in the shape of free transmission of documents. If the documents are not to be transmitted free to the people, then there is no use of publishing them.

Mr. ANTHONY. We do not publish them.

Mr. BAYARD. But they have been published. We have got to-day cords upon cords of documents down stairs and no means of getting them out to the people.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me to explain, these documents were printed under the old law before the franking privilege was repealed, and the Senate passed a bill in the early part of the present session, reported from the Committee on Printing, suspending the printing of all those documents under the general law. That bill has not been concurred in by the House; but there have been few documents printed by special orders. The great bulk of our documents are printed by special orders. There has not been a quarter printed at this session that there was the last long session.

Mr. BAYARD. Do I understand the Senator to say that no public documents have been ordered to be printed since the franking privilege was abolished?

Mr. ANTHONY. Very few indeed. We provided the other day for the printing of five thousand copies of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the proposed constitutional amendment in relation to presidential elections, which will cost less than sixty dollars; but there has been no considerable printing of documents. There have been no additional copies of the Agricultural Report printed.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, my judgment may be at fault in the support of the proposition here to permit all documents published by Congress to go free through the mails; but I do not think there is a Senator on this floor who can successfully meet the proposition when it is presented in the form of a suggestion in favor of the dissemination of knowledge among the people. All the machinery of the Government for the transmission of the mails is already in operation. It costs the Government not one single cent to distribute these documents. We have the proof before us that the cost of the mail service has not been lessened by the abolition of the franking privilege; for I find upon my table, and I presume every Senator has upon his table, petitions coming from various mail-routes, beseeching the Postmaster-General to enlarge and increase the compensation that has been heretofore given for the transmission of the mails. Instead of finding that the mail service is performed to-day at a reduction of rates by reason of the abolition of the franking privilege, the fact stands here incontrovertible that the mail service is demanding an increase of rates, and the evidence is before us that that demand on the part of the railroads of the country will be after a while acceded to. Then

I submit the question to the Senate, where is the Government to lose a single solitary cent by reason of the transmission of the documents published by Congress through the mails? I submit, in the next place, the proposition whether we are here with closed doors to continue our sessions; whether it is our purpose to refuse the people that information with regard to the doings of Congress which the free people of every nation demand to know of their representatives.

The franking privilege, as it was called, was assailed because that privilege was abused. It was said that politicians used it in the interest of party organizations, and the objection was well founded; but it was not without its compensations, for each of the political parties or fragments of political parties in the United States were never without representatives in Congress——

Mr. LEWIS. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Mississippi. He says the franking privilege was abused in the franking of political documents. I say that abuse has not been abolished yet. I have now in my room plenty of documents, not on Government business, but electioneering documents, franked with the official stamp upon them by officers of the Government.

Mr. ALCORN. I will come to that directly. But I was going on to say that even the privilege, as it was termed under the old régime, abused as it was said to be abused, was not without its compensations. Every political organization in the land from the time that parties have assumed the form of organizations in this Government, has always had a representative on the floor of Congress, and to that representative was secured the franking privilege, and through that means information was communicated everywhere to the people all over the country. The intelligence of the people was enlightened and promoted by reason of this franking privilege. The dissemination of knowledge was carried out to the uttermost confines of the land through this franking privilege. The experience of the past twelve months shows the fact that so far as the mail service is concerned the cost of that service was not increased one single dollar by reason of the franking privilege. What matters it to the railroad company from here to New York, for example, or from here to New Orleans, who transport the mail in their cars provided for the purpose, whether they have a few hundred or a few thousand Agricultural Reports in that mail car? It is a mere bagatelle; it amounts to nothing. They will carry one hundred tons' of mail matter just as cheaply as they will carry twenty-five tons' weight over the same distance of road.

Mr. President, I was led to vote for the abolition of the franking privilege. I had not been long here. It was a subject to which I had not given attention. In truth I had not even thought of it in its bearings upon the intelligence of the people of the country. I had heard the newspaper clamor about it being abused, and I had been appealed to as a member of Congress to give my frank in various instances for the purpose of disseminating certain documents, and I saw very well how this privilege, which was intended to be a personal privilege and which no member of Congress was justified in ever giving out, but which belonged to him personally, to be executed in his presence, might be abused.

But, sir, how stands the fact to-day? You say to the people of the country "The franking privilege has been abolished." The fact stands out that it is not abolished; that every Executive Department of the Government to-day exercises the franking privilege, and there is no check on any of those Departments for the abuses that will necessarily grow up in the service, and actually to-day the abuses that may occur under the privilege which is now vouchsafed to the Departments are greater if anything than at the time the privilege was regulated under the old régime. The member of Congress to-day is denied the privilege of franking documents, it is true; but the Agricultural Department, the State Department, the Post-Office Department, all the Departments of the Government, send out their franks. They have them printed at the expense of the Government, and all they have to do to send a document to the limits of the nation is simply to put upon it a stamp which they have by the thousands and tens of thousands at their command. If you have a document that emanates from any of those Departments and you desire to have it go to your constituents without charge to you, you can send it to one of the Departments I presume, without having tried the matter, with your compliments to its head, and request him to send it, and he will put his stamp upon it and send it away. I know that is the case with regard to seeds, &c. The Commissioner of Agriculture sends out those seeds. So far as I was concerned, when the seeds came to me I sent them back to him and asked him to send them to my constituents. Why? Because he had a roll of stamps in his hands and could send them without charge, whereas if I were to send them I would have to pay the postage on them.

Now, sir, what do we publish documents here for? Why does Congress publish documents? Are they not for the benefit of the people? The publication of these documents costs the Government money; and the question of publishing documents is one that addresses itself to the economy of the United States. It addresses itself here to us who are charged with the duty of economizing in everything in which we can economize properly in the affairs of this Government; but after a document is published it will go to the people, if you will permit it to go free, without the cost of a single cent to the Government of the United States. It costs no one anything. It does not cost the mail service a cent, and it saves the member of Congress or your constituent at home the simple item of postage upon the document.

The plan we now have before us for the printing and dissemination of documents is simply a means of raising revenue at the expense of the intelligence of the people. It is a means of raising revenue at the expense of the information which the people are entitled to have. It is a policy that in the end withholds from the people that information which they are entitled to have, that information which every free people demand they shall have without cost and without price to them.

It is not a revival of the franking privilege to declare by this Congress that public documents published under the authority of Congress shall go through the mails without charge. There is no franking privilege in that. It is simply a law that permits public documents that are deemed of sufficient importance to be printed at the expense of the Government to go through the mails free of charge that the people may have them. There is no franking privilege in that; and there is not a Senator here who can give a reason why these public documents printed at the expense of the nation should not go through the mails free of charge. I repeat that there is not a single mail line in America that will be increased in the cost of transportation one single cent by reason of the enactment of this law; and unless it can be shown that the expense is increased, that the people are taxed, that we impose a burden upon them, then I say open the avenues and let intelligence, let information, let that knowledge which emanates here and flows out to the people go to them that they may be familiarized with what we are doing, and that their judgment may be had upon questions of legislation here before Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to correct my friend from Mississippi, for I know he means to be accurate in his statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to hear the Senator from Maine. I want to make a motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Mississippi states too broadly, surely, that no additional compensation would be paid if all the documents went through the mails free. The Senator is certainly mistaken. Under the old rule of contracting, the mails were carried irrespective of their weight, without any regard to it; but under present contracts all the principal railroads carry the mails by weight, and if you add to that weight you add to the compensation.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to make a motion to expedite the public business. It is manifest that this bill which now involves the revival in some form of the franking privilege and the mode of distributing documents through the mails is a matter pertinent and proper to the post-office appropriation bill. The bill will undoubtedly receive some legislative amendments; at any rate, the right to offer legislative amendments to it has been reserved, and the Committee on Appropriations itself proposes to offer legislative amendments to that bill It is manifest, therefore, that all the objects of this bill can be accomplished by moving it as an amendment to the post-office appropriation bill; whereas if this discussion is continued upon this bill there is no probability that it will soon terminate. In view of the pressing necessity and importance of acting upon the moiety bill, I move that this bill be postponed with a view to take up House bill 3171, to repeal moieties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield for that purpose? He was still upon the floor when the Senator from Ohio rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon of the Senator.

Mr. ALCORN. Not at all. I was about through. I had stopped to hear the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not intend to interrupt the Senator, but as soon as he is through my motion will be in order.

Mr. ALCORN. I merely reply to the Senator from Maine that the increased cost, even under the suggestion that he makes, would be very immaterial, and it would be only upon a few lines. On the leading lines of road perhaps that is the case; but I will say that that device, for it is nothing more, could be very well met by legislation on the part of this Government. I undertake to say that we could secure the transportation of the mails without any of these conditions, and that the Government would economize by it, for when you come to distribute and transport the mails by weight, you open a door to fraud that may be practiced, whereof we cannot find the limit.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had hoped that this bill might pass, or those portions which were intended to reform the distribution, congressional and executive, of the public documents; but if we are going into a discussion upon the franking privilege, I cannot ask the Senate to waste a whole day upon this bill as was the case on Friday; and if the Senator from Ohio insists upon taking up the moiety bill, which I know is very important, I shall not resist it.

Mr. WINDOM. I dislike to resist the taking up of the bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio, but I should like to take up the resolution reported by the Select Committee on Transportation which was pending in the Senate the other day, which can be disposed of in an hour or two, and I hope the Senate will permit it to be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the moiety bill will take long; at least I have had no indications that it will take long.

Mr. WINDOM. The resolution referred to was under discussion and was laid aside temporarily in order to take up the printing bill. I think it can be finished in a very short time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio insist on his motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do. I will assist the Senator from Minnesota, as soon as this bill is disposed of, in getting up his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the pending bill be laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of what is known as the moiety bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before proceeding to the consideration of the bill, the Chair will lay before the Senate certain bills and messages now on the table.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes.

On motion by Mr. SARGENT, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. MORRILL of Maine, and Mr. KELLY.

LOUISVILLE AND BARDSTOWN TURNPIKE COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company, which was to strike out the words—

For two bridges on said road, one over Salt River, the other over Floyd's Fork, burned and destroyed by the order of General Nelson, in command at the time of the United States troops in Kentucky, as a military necessity, on the 23d day of September, 1862;

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

To make compensation for two bridges on the road of said company, one over Salt River, the other over Floyd's Fork, constructed for the military service by said company by advice of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope that amendment will be concurred in. The chairman of the Committee on Claims I know intends to make that motion; but he is now out.

Mr. SCOTT entered the Chamber.

Mr. STEVENSON. Here he is.

Mr. SCOTT. I move the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not think it will take a minute. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to anything being taken up now until the moiety bill is disposed of.

Mr. ALCORN. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3652) providing for publication of the revised statutes of the United States; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BENJAMIN W. REYNOLDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Messrs. ROBERTSON, ALCORN, and NORWOOD conferees on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds.

MOIETIES UNDER CUSTOMS LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose we had better act on the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance as the reading of the bill proceeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) That course will be pursued if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section 1, after the word "that," in line 1, to strike out the words "section 7 of the act entitled 'An act to punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1863;" so that the section will read:

That the thirty-ninth section of the act entitled "An act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes," approved July 18, 1866; and the second section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the object in striking out this part of the House bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that section 7 of the act of 1863, which is proposed to be repealed by this bill, has already been repealed by the fourth section of the act of March 2, 1867, referred to in a subsequent part of this same section. It is simply an unnecessary recital, a recital of an act already repealed.

Mr. CONKLING. Recited by mistake?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, after the word "forfeitures" in line 2, to insert the words "under the customs-revenue laws," and in line 7 to insert "such" before "fines;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 2. That all provisions of law under which moieties of any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, under the customs-revenue laws, or any share therein, or commission thereon, are paid to informers, or officers of customs, or other officers of the United States, are hereby repealed; and from and after the date of the passage of this act the proceeds of all such fines, penalties, and forfeitures shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish to object to the amendment, but I wish the Senator having the bill in charge would indicate as we go along the purpose of the various amendments. Why is the repeal of moieties of fines, penalties, and forfeitures confined to the customs-revenue laws?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that if left as it was the section would repeal all fines, penalties, and forfeitures contained in other laws; for instance in the steamboat-inspection laws, the passenger act, and other laws of that kind, for the enforcement of which no provision is made in the bill. The section as left by the House might repeal provisions, not designed to be touched, as to fines and penalties under the steamboat-inspection law and the passenger law. Therefore we confine it to the repeal of moieties under the customs laws.

Mr. HAMLIN. How about the internal-revenue laws?

Mr. SHERMAN. The moieties under the internal-revenue laws have been already repealed.

Mr. CONKLING. That we may understand this matter fully, I venture to make one remark. As the House prepared the section it was a repeal of "all provisions of law under which moieties of any fines, penalties, or forfeitures, or any share therein, or commission thereon," were paid "to informers or officers of customs or other officers of the United States." Now, if we wish to put an end to the moiety system, I do not understand why these same officers should receive moieties of fines and penalties imposed by one law rather than by another. If the section were to repeal penalties altogether, I could see the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio; but the section is to prevent hereafter the receipt by certain officers of moieties of fines and penalties. If that system is vicious and we wish to put an end to it, I do not see why these men should have moieties of fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed by one law, any more than if they were imposed by another. I do not intend to make an objection, but I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that this is an impairment by so much of the view of the other House in this regard.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will see that this section as drawn, although manifestly it was the purpose of the act only to affect the customs laws, prohibits "all moieties of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, or any share therein, or any commission thereon, to informers or officers of customs or other officers." The mischief sought to be corrected by this act relates to moieties under the customs laws. I am informed by the Treasury Department that the effect of this section would be to interfere with and repeal the steamboat-inspection laws and the passenger act, for the enforcement of which no provision is made in this bill, and other laws of that kind involving the preservation and safety of life. In lieu of the moieties under the customs laws we provide other remedies in this bill; for instance, we place it within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to reward information under sections of the bill, but this section as drawn would repeal all the clauses of these other laws not intended to be affected without substituting anything in their place.

This amendment is made at the request of the Treasury Department, whose recommendation I have in my hand. Our attention was called to this very point, stating that unless this section was limited in some way it would go far beyond the purpose of the act, and would repeal and interfere with laws, healthy in their operation, for the preservation of life on steamboats.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator to observe that I do not make the remark I do as criticising the action of the committee. If the House in framing this section has made an improvident provision, surely the committee ought to correct it. My suggestion, however, is that if moieties as a system be vicious or so questionable that we think it better to put an end to it at least as an experiment, then if the House has stricken out moieties altogether and provided no substitute whatever in certain cases, logically it seems to me we ought to include those cases such as the Senator now specifies in the after portions of the bill making provisions in the respect he indicates for the cases in which moieties will be abolished by the section as it stands. In other words, if the system be vicious I do not see why we should retain it in some places and abolish it in others. But I do not intend to do more than understand, as we go along, what the object of the various provisions is.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was of the Committee on Finance in section 3, to insert after the word "otherwise," in line 5, the words "and for the purpose of making such compensation for the next fiscal year, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 3. That it shall hereafter be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money specifically appropriated by Congress, to make suitable compensation in certain cases under the customs-revenue laws, as hereinafter provided, and not otherwise; and for the purpose of making such compensation for the next fiscal year, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and he shall annually report to Congress, in detail, all payments by him for such purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to make all that part of section 3 after the word "purpose," in line 10, a new section by inserting before the word "whenever" the word "That" and the preceding words "Sec. 4."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to what I think is an omission in the eighth line of section 4. I think the word "duties" should precede the word "costs," to make it correspond with existing laws. The law now is that in all seizures under $500 there is no deduction of duties, but in all such over $500, under the existing law, before the moiety is divided, the moiety is made out of what is left after deducting the duties, costs, and charges; and the word "duties" should be inserted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I accept the amendment. The Senator is no doubt more familiar with the details of the law than I am.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move, then, that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether it will be agreeable and convenient to him, as we go along now, for anybody to ask a question as to the meaning of this bill or reserve it to a future time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to answer any question.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I should be glad if the Senator would state the meaning of the proviso beginning on line 8, of section 4, and proceeding in a respect which I will indicate;

That for the purposes of this act, smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles.

I wish to inquire whether in case of fraud by the consignor, an undervaluation in a foreign country to which fraud the consignee here is not privy, that act would be smuggling within the meaning of this statute, or whether it is intended to restrict it only to the case of fraud existing on the part of the man bringing in, as the phrase is?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should think the fair construction of this language would confine it to the fraudulent act of bringing into the United States an article, or with such intent attempting to bring it into the United States, and I understand that this proviso substantially defines smuggling according to the present law. We compared it. There are two definitions of smuggling in the present law, both of which are made penal offenses, but there is a little confusion between them. I take it, without knowing directly, that this is an attempt to define the act of smuggling for the purposes of this act, so as to make it a little more clear. The committee at first thought it better to strike out the proviso, because the word "smuggling" was well understood in the criminal law. If the Senator can define the act of smuggling more clearly than this clause does I should be glad to have his assistance. Undervaluation is a different thing; it is not included under the term "smuggling."

Mr. CONKLING. My understanding was and is that one of the frauds punished by the revenue laws and one of the fields in which numerous and extensive frauds are committed may be described by a case in which a fraudulent undervaluation is made in a foreign country, the goods sent are accompanied by an invoice which is fraudulent and undervalued, and the goods are entered and passed according to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that the twelfth section on page 8 covers the class of offenses to which he now refers of fraudulent undervaluations.

Mr. CONKLING. I had looked at that section, and I proposed to call the attention of the Senator to it when it should be reached. I think if he will look at it carefully, he will find that in place of curing the defect, if defect it be, to which I now direct his attention, it is in the same direction. What is it?

That any owner, importer, consignee, agent, or other person who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make, or attempt to make, any entry of imported merchandise, by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, or who shall be guilty of any willful act or omission, &c.

I think the Senator will see that that section would not lay that upon a man who in entire innocence, having no knowledge whatever that any fraud had been committed, but as he supposed, with entire integrity and conformity with law, should go on as an importer or an agent of an importer or owner or consignee to whom goods might thus have been sent. But I have accomplished my object sufficiently by asking the attention of the committee to whatever there may be in the suggestion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like the attention of the chairman of the committee to this view of the case. The proviso is:

That for the purposes of this act, smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the custom-house, or submitting them to the officer of the revenue for examination.

So that I suppose if an invoice were presented to an officer of the customs, or if the goods themselves were presented to an officer of the customs, although there might be a fraud, it would not be smuggling. Now, suppose this, which is the common case in many of the ports, especially in the city of New York: that a person arriving as a passenger, and having in his possession goods that are dutiable, presents the package to the officer of customs—an inspector—who, either because he is negligent of his duty or because, as has sometimes been the case, he has a consideration which leads him to neglect his duty, does not examine these goods, and the passenger passes out of the custody of the officers of the customs with his goods, that act under this statute I take it would not be smuggling.

Mr. BAYARD. It depends on the intent.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is presented to the officer of the customs, and either because he is negligent or because he is in a worse state of mind he does not examine the goods, the act would not be smuggling I take it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Such a case would be punished under the general laws about smuggling.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If you define here what smuggling is, then all the acts that are in existence operate under the power of that definition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not; for the Senator will see that the words are: "provided, that for the purposes of this act smuggling shall be" so and so. There are criminal laws defining what smuggling is, declaring that the doing of a certain act shall make a person subject to fine, penalties, and imprisonment for smuggling.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator misapprehends my view, or else I misapprehend the provision of the bill. If a party arriving with goods in his personal possession, which are liable to duty, offers the package on the wharf or upon the vessel to an inspector of customs for examination, and the inspector for some reason does not make the examination, and the person having possession of the goods goes away and avoids the duties, that act under this statute is not smuggling; and inasmuch as it is not smuggling, no other provision of law that may be operative can attach to that person and hold him guilty of the act of smuggling.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator mistakes the object of the fourth section. The fourth section is simply to allow and define when the compensation here provided for shall be paid for the detection of smuggling. It is only intended to define when the Secretary of the Treasury may use the money that is appropriated by the preceding section to pay for the detection of the act of smuggling or the intention to smuggle, and does not affect any of the existing laws punishing smuggling. In the case put by the Senator, where an officer is bribed to pass goods of a passenger, he is guilty of a crime and punishable under existing laws.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The officer is guilty of receiving a bribe, and the person giving the bribe is guilty, but not chargeable with smuggling under this statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed—but the Senator must be better informed than I—that under the present law the person offering the bribe is severely punished.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly. I am not looking to that, but I am looking to the provision of the law to prevent smuggling. What is this thing that is done? I do not speak of the bribery; but what is the offense of passing the goods without duty, and under what statute do you put the person who brings the goods into port, to punishment?

Mr. SHERMAN. The object of this section is to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury a sum of money with which he can reward the actual detection of fraud. It does not attempt to define smuggling for purposes of punishment, but to define for the purposes of this act the character of smuggling that the Secretary of the Treasury is to use the money here appropriated to prevent or detect. The old law in regard to smuggling is left unimpaired both as to the man who smuggles and as to the officer who participates and as to all parties concerned, and all that this section does is to define smuggling, so that when an officer of the customs shall detect goods, wares, or merchandise in the act of being smuggled, he shall be rewarded in the nature of a moiety. It only defines the character of smuggling, the detection of which is rewarded by this act. The Senator from Massachusetts has had so much experience in the administration of the customs laws that I would like very much indeed to have him assist us in making this bill strong and avoid any escape from proper penalties. This section does not modify the law in regard to smuggling, but only gives in certain defined cases to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to reward its detection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have not examined this whole act sufficiently to know what the full effect of the proviso might be; but I believe the object would be accomplished just as well by leaving out the proviso, and then the legal definition of smuggling would be applicable to all cases that might arise under this statute in reference to the distribution that might be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he would follow the general rule of law.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state in reply to that, that there are two definitions of smuggling in the crimes act. They were a little confused and not quite so clear as this. We found this definition here, and we thought it clearer. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has the crimes act and can read the definitions.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Suppose you say "for the purposes of this section."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that would answer.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That would relieve it and make it clear.

Mr. SHERMAN. The preceding section relates to the same matter.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If you limit it to this and the preceding section I think it would be better.

Mr. SHERMAN. The preceding section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make suitable compensation. That must be embraced. I do not think there is any danger as it stands.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, I will not press the suggestion now.

Mr. CAMERON. I dislike to give so much power to the Secretary of the Treasury. He has a great deal too much now. His establishment is larger than any man seems to have had the ability to control for a long time. Now, after talking about "spies" and "informers" for years past, we are going to give him authority to spend $200,000 to employ spies and informers at his own pleasure. I dislike the whole of that, and I move to strike out the words in italics from line 5 to line 8, in section 3, inclusive.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have passed that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS.) The Chair will inform the Senator from Pennsylvania that the amendment in that section having been adopted by the committee, his motion to strike out is not in order now, but will be in the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I move to reconsider the vote on that amendment giving the Secretary of the Treasury money to pay informers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to the Senator to let us get through with the other amendments.

Mr. CAMERON. I would rather fix the bill as we go on. It is an important bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves to reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment referred to by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to have a reconsideration so that the Senate may have a vote upon that question.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not want to take the vote now. The Senate is thin and I would rather have a little time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why cannot my friend from Pennsylvania let this point go over until after we finish the reading of the bill?

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to do as I have done. I make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays, and that will settle the question.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 7, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Goldthwaite, and Ramsey—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Windom—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Brownlow, Buckingham, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, West, and Wright—33.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert the following after section 4:

SEC. 5. That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business-book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States, may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove; and thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendent or claimant by the United States marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of suit in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court. And the said attorney shall be permitted to make examination of said book, invoice, or paper, if produced, and may offer the same in evidence on behalf of the United States. But the owner of said books and papers, his agent or attorney, shall have free access to them at all reasonable times pending their custody by the court.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am in hopes this amendment of the Committee on Finance will not be concurred in. The bill as it came from the House was drawn as a repeal pure and simple of the act of March 2, 1867, amendatory of the law of March 3, 1863, which for the first time in the history of our country permitted the seizure of the books and papers of our citizens for the purpose of procuring the condemnation of their property in courts of justice. I do not propose to dwell upon the facts fully developed two years ago by an investigation of the New York custom-house affairs, and also during the present winter by the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, which seem to have resulted in causing the people of this country, without distinction of party or occupation, with one voice, to agree that such a law as that of 1867, under which such atrocities have been accomplished in the name of law in this country, and which we have strangely permitted, should no longer disgrace the statute-book of a free country.

I was not present at the deliberations of the Committee on Finance when they agreed upon the section which is now before the Senate. Had I been I should have urged the objections that I propose now to urge, and as shortly as I may.

Mr. President, is it not a false and defective principle that our system of public justice laid down by general law, should not be the same in relation to the Government as to any individual citizen? Can we claim because of the sovereignty of our Government, that therefore different rules and principles should apply to its rights and its claims as compared with the rights of the humblest citizen who lives under it? Certainly, it cannot be so. The great glory of our law is the equality and indifference with which it regards both power and feebleness; that in its presence inequality is unknown, and that the same measure and the same principle of justice applies alike to the weak and the strong, to the great government as to the humble culprit who may stand at its bar for condemnation or acquittal. We have and have had since the very foundation of our Government, under the law of the 24th of September, 1789, ample provision in proper cases to secure the production of books and papers of a party litigant pertinent to the matters in controversy when justice and equity shall demand. It is provided by that law:

That all the said courts of the United States shall have power in the trial of actions at law, on motion and due notice thereof being given, to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery; and if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion, to give the like judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit; and if a defendant shall fail to comply with such order to produce books or writings, it shall be lawful for the courts respectively, on motion as aforesaid, to give judgment against him or her by default.

That has ever been the law since 1789, and it is nothing but the re-enactment of laws which years before prevailed in Great Britain, from whom chiefly our system of laws was derived. It is merely a statutory re-enactment of the practice prevailing in courts of chancery since the institution of courts of chancery; and therefore under this law the cases in which it applies, the occasions when the power of the court shall be exercised are matters which have been canvassed thoroughly and in regard to which lawyers and courts accustomed to the administration of justice are no longer in doubt. What, then, is there in the present case that should remove beyond or outside of this law the merchant defending his rights in a court of justice because the Government of the United States happens to be on the other side defending or pursuing him for alleged duties or penalties?

Mr. President, the statute-books of the United States fairly bristle with penalties against infringement of the revenue laws. No one can glance his eye over the legislation of this country as spread upon our statute-books without seeing that there is more than abundant penalty against infraction of the revenue laws. This bill proposes to do more, in my opinion, to insure a rigid and complete collection of the revenue upon imports than those laws which it repeals and which I suppose were intended to produce the like effect, but which have been so horribly perverted from their end and have become, as we have seen, instruments of the most monstrous injustice, and have been absolutely a disgrace and crying shame to the name of American jurisprudence.

There is no necessity for this section. One resolute conviction; one instance of firm, steadfast prosecution unto conviction of a dishonest merchant; the presence of one such man in the prisoners' dock, and subsequently within the walls of a penitentiary, would do fifty times more, yea a thousand times more, to procure a complete and satisfactory enforcement of the laws and collection of the revenue than all these laws for the division of moieties and spoils among spies and informers have done in the last eleven years of their existence, or would be able to do in the next hundred years. It stands as a matter of record before the Senate and the country that not one single case of conviction is to be found, not one single case in which the penalty of the law has been exacted and the punishment prescribed by law been enforced against the merchant who has violated the revenue laws of the United States. I say that in the face of the record of proceedings of the committee of the Senate for investigation in 1872 and the reiterated testimony taken this winter before the committee of the House of Representatives. Settlement with the informers and their custom-house agents and attorneys, payment of moneys, due or not due, to them, has ended every complaint; and such payments compounded all felonies and prosecutions and satisfied every demand of criminal legislation. Public justice was sold and delivered over to the private profit of officials and informers.

With abundant means of punishing dishonest and unfair merchants, this apparent and confessed abundance of means of punishment, why should we violate those principles of personal and constitutional liberty which were sought to be established by the great charter of our Government for the sake of giving increased possibility of conviction in revenue cases? Mr. President, it is not necessary. I have considered this subject long and carefully and deliberately, and I am satisfied that such a provision as is now presented by the Committee on Finance is actually an invasion of those principles which we cannot hold too sacred, principles which are as old as the law of justice itself, that a man shall not be compelled to bear testimony against himself, and that his books and papers, his private writings, shall not be turned into engines for his spoliation and destruction.

I do not propose to delay the Senate, but I am very well aware that this subject has been not only considered by myself, but has been before the public mind; it has been made the subject of careful investigation by merchants in New York, and after due examination, enlightened by the testimony taken in New York two years ago, enlightened by the testimony taken during this winter by the committee of the House, that branch of the Government have deliberately struck out everything relating to seizure and examination of private books and papers, or the involuntary production of mercantile books and papers, and left the Government in the same position occupied by every citizen in the land, where the Government ought to stand, in no position either of detriment or of peculiar advantage in cases where its rights were submitted to the decision of its own tribunals of public justice.

There not only is under the existing law that I have read to the Senate means to compel the production in proper cases of the books and papers of an opposing party where they contain testimony pertinent to the issue, but the party demanding the books has the right of inspection, which should apply equally to the Government as to an individual; and with that law standing on the statute-book, where can there be the need of the section reported by the Senate Committee? I admit that even this law is a step toward reforming the law of 1867 than which anything more monstrous can scarcely be imagined.

Mr. CONKLING. To what act does the Senator refer beside the act of 1867?

Mr. BAYARD. The general law of 1789. The Senator was not in his place when I read it; and, not wishing to repeat, I say this section is unnecessary with that general law in existence constantly practiced under, from which our States have drawn much of their legislation, and in regard to the practice under which there is no doubt in courts of justice, for it has all been carefully discussed in the course of frequent litigation and the principles and rules to which it applies are definitely and well ascertained. It seems that when the Government has all that protection, together with full competency to enforce severe penalties, fines, and forfeitures, we give it the most ample power to secure and compel the collection of its revenues and punish as it should those who seek dishonestly to evade them and endeavor to escape the lawful duties which the legislation of the country demands.

I hope the amendment of the committee will not receive the favor of the Senate and that the bill will be allowed in that and other respects to stand as it was when it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this section gave the committee more trouble than any other provision of the bill, and I am free to say that I regard it as vital to the bill and as absolutely necessary to the due collection of the revenue. We were disposed to grant all that we could to aid the merchants in carrying on their business and relieve them from all embarrassment and all harsh provisions of law; and therefore the first section of the bill, which repeals all provisions that enable the Government of the United States to get possession of the books and papers of merchants, is acquiesced in, but we felt at the same time that some other provision of a proper character must be inserted in this law to enable the Government of the United States to have access to books and papers, to test whether or not an invoice was fraudulent.

The Senator says that on the statute-book there is already sufficient authority, and that from the foundation of the Government to 1863 that authority was deemed sufficient; but upon reference to the statutes the only law that is referred to that would enable the Government in any case to get possession of books and papers necessary to the prosecution of a case is in the old judiciary act of 1789. It is not necessary to read that again to show to lawyers that that act is not adapted for the purpose of enforcing a fine or a penalty or a forfeiture. The general purpose of that act was to enable a party litigant in a suit to call on the adverse party to produce certain papers, but that could only be done in such cases as where in the English practice a court of equity would interfere to compel the production of papers. It is also a well-known principle of law that courts of equity will not interfere by such summary process to aid in the enforcement of fines, penalties, and forfeitures. Therefore, as far as we know, there has been no application of the law of 1789 to cases such as are ordinarily prosecuted against persons who violate the customs laws.

If there is no provision inserted in the place of the sections repealed by this act, there will be no means by which the Government of the United States can pursue an alleged fraud by a merchant so as to secure the production of his books and papers. If there is any such law we should like very much to have it produced. There is none except the law of 1789, and that is really not applicable to the case at all. It then became necessary to make some provision for the production of books and papers, and on examination we found that the Committee on Ways and Means in the House had inserted in this bill the substance of this section by which the United States might require the production of books and papers; but on a motion in the House, probably under some feeling of excitement growing out of recent controversies, the section was stricken out without much debate or any real opportunity to debate it, and the bill came to us without any provision of this kind. After carefully examining it, hearing gentlemen who were interested in the passage of the bill and opposed to the section, we came to the conclusion that it was necessary to restore it. The section as it now stands is precisely similar to the law of almost every State of the Union. It is very similar to the law of Ohio, very similar to the law of New York. The law of Ohio authorizes any party to procure books and papers for his adversary. When I was practicing in the courts this mode of proceeding to compel the production of books and papers was an ordinary summary proceeding enforced by the courts in all cases in favor of the plaintiff or defendant. It is true there might be some doubt whether under the laws of Ohio that process could be used for the enforcement of a fine or a penalty, but the proceedings under the customs laws are rather in the nature of suits for debts. There is no reason why the same remedy should not be given to the United States to enforce these penalties as would be given any ordinary litigant, plaintiff or defendant.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the Senator from Ohio say that there is any State in the Union that has a law authorizing the production of any defendant's books in evidence against himself for the enforcement of a penalty? I thought that every constitution in every State of this Union protected a man from giving evidence against himself in any quasi criminal prosecution.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator had read this bill he would have found that there was no necessity for asking that question. No man is compelled to convict himself in a criminal prosecution. I am speaking of proceedings to recover penalties rather in the nature of a debt. As a matter of course, the Constitution protects a man from testifying against himself, but this section only applies to ordinary proceedings to enforce a claim for money although it may be in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture, or it may be a claim for the property itself that is forfeited or a penalty for the non-payment of duty. It provides:

That in all suits and proceedings other than criminal arising under any of the revenue-laws of the United States, the attorney representing the Government, whenever, in his belief, any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant.

I say that that is the law in most of the States of the Union, and in every State there is a proceeding more or less effective to compel parties to produce books and papers in cases other than criminal; and therefore when we are amending the law which repeals many obnoxious provisions of a more severe character, we ought to provide some remedy which will enable the United States to follow an adversary, an importer, an agent, a consignee, and secure his books and papers for the purpose of enforcing what? A debt due to the United States; enforcing a money claim. This was the conclusion of the Committee on Finance after examining this matter very fully, and I supposed my friend from Delaware was present at the time, but he tells me he was not. We considered this matter fully after hearing the very intelligent gentlemen who came from New York to press the passage of this bill, among whom was Mr. Jackson S. Schultz. They opposed not only the repeal of moieties, but they opposed the introduction of any section like this; but after it was all over and the committee had adopted the section, I think by general consent, although my friend, the Senator from Delaware, tells me he was not present, I received this letter from Mr. Schultz:

On the return of Mr. S. B. Eaton, our counsel, he informs us that your Finance Committee propose to restore the old third section in regard to the seizure of books and papers. Of course it is not modest for us merchants to object to a provision so moderate in its effect as the section now inserted. If we did object it might seem that we were afraid to show our books and have them used as evidence against us. Therefore we shall make no objection.

These merchants were practical men, and they conceded very readily that when an allegation of fraud was made against one of them or against a consignee or importer, it might be important not only for his protection, but for the protection of the United States that the United States might follow the books and papers and seize them for the purpose of evidence. This provision in my judgment is just as necessary for the honest importer who desires to conduct his business in an honest and honorable way as it is for the United States, because every false importation, every evasion of the customs laws is just as great an injury to the honest importer as it is to the Government of the United States. Under the circumstances, we thought with Mr. Schultz, that after we had repealed the obnoxious laws complained of, we had better restore to this law this section, which in my judgment will be far more effective, far more beneficial, far more useful to the officers of the United States in pursuing frauds and detecting frauds, than the old severe provisions that were so much complained of.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I can very well see why a high-toned merchant like Mr. Schultz might write as he did to the Committee on Finance. He says, if I recollect the words, that it might be supposed he was unwilling to show his books under the belief that they were unfaithfully kept, and therefore he is willing that you shall put in the clause. A high-toned man might say that very readily. If suspected of fraud he would go beyond what justice and his own interests and the interests of propriety would demand of him. But it seems to me horrible that a merchant's books should be subject to the seizure of any committee of Congress on the application of some spy who is paid for not only taking the money from the merchant, but for destroying his character. The Senator from Ohio smiles. His conscience and his feelings may not be so delicate as I had supposed they were; but I remember the case of Mr. Dodge who was robbed of several thousand dollars because he became too nervous to defend himself. There was a man with a reputation earned by fifty years of service in his profession as a merchant, without taint, and he is suddenly called upon by a man commissioned by the Government to go and tell him that unless he pays a certain sum of money he will be exposed on the charge of a crime that he never dreamed of committing. In this country, where commerce is so great a part of our interests, we should protect the merchant as well as every other man engaged in trade or business, the merchant especially, because he undergoes greater risks than any other business man. Necessarily he is obliged to employ a great many people, upon whom he has to depend entirely, upon whose integrity he relies without the opportunity even of testing it; and yet, by some slight misconduct, or, if you will, an open misconduct of one of his employés, that man's reputation of fifty years' standing is to be destroyed by a pimp, a panderer, or spy of some venal office-holder.

I am opposed to all that sort of thing. It is a part of our administration which grew up during the war. Perhaps during the war it was necessary that men without character should be employed to do duties of this sort for the sake of the preservation of the country; but that is not so in time of peace. It is the interest as well as the duty of every man to protect the honest merchant, the honest trader, and the honest manufacturer. There is an interest beyond the interest of the Government. The interest of the people is far beyond the mere Treasury of the Government. Every man who toils to support this Government has an interest greater than the man who comes here to administer it.

I shall vote against giving this inquisitorial power to any officer to go and examine the books or papers of an individual, no matter how high or how low his station may be in society.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am exceedingly anxious, as I know the other members of the Senate are, to dispose of this bill as speedily as possible; but I think there is involved in this section a matter of vital principle to this bill that we ought to understand before the vote is taken. I think there is not a little danger, in view I was going to say of a possible, I may say of an actual, prejudice and feeling that obtains against what are called informers under our revenue law as it stands at present, that we may go to the other extreme and leave the door open in such a way that our revenue laws will be quite inefficient. I think this section is not only necessary to the proper policy of this bill, but I think it is exceedingly mild as it stands, and I beg the attention of Senators to it in all its particulars.

It must be remembered that by this section these books cannot be produced for examination without the order of a court. There must be a motion, a showing made, and the court must be satisfied that the books are necessary in the trial of the cause and that it is proper and necessary to the trial of the issues joined between the parties to produce them. It is not the act of a mere informer going to a merchant's house and taking his books without any order of the court; but the court being appealed to, and all the facts made known and presented, the court, having in view the rights of the Government and the rights of the defendant, sitting there anxious to protect the rights of each, determines that in that particular case the books or papers ought to be produced. When the books or papers are thus produced——

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator pardon me for an interruption? He speaks of the book or paper being necessary in the opinion of the court for the establishment of justice in the issue joined in the proceedings. If he will look at the bill I think he will find that it merely requires a statement by the attorney representing the Government that the book or paper belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant will tend to prove any allegation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was attempting to give my construction of the section as it stands. I did not pretend to give the language of the section. The language of the section as it is found here is this:

And thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion, issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice.

I maintain that although the motion has been made and in all respects this provision of the statute has been complied with, if the court when it comes to look at all the allegations, the nature of the issue joined, what it is that is to be established, reaches the conclusion that it is not necessary for the promotion of justice or the settlement of the question between the parties to produce those books, there is no requirement in the section that he shall produce them; that it is a matter resting in the discretion of the court in view of the circumstances of the case as they then stand.

It is suggested that under the act of 1789 power sufficient is already given to the court on this subject. I favored the insertion of this section in the bill largely for the reason that I believe it is more in the favor of the merchant than the act of 1789, for it will be found that by the act of 1789 if the book or paper is not produced in the case supposed, there, in the case of a defendant if he fails to produce it, judgment shall go against him at once upon the whole case as by default, and if the plaintiff fails to produce it in the case provided for in the statute, then judgment shall go against him on all the issues joined as by nonsuit. But that is not the effect of this section. The effect of this section is simply that the allegation in the motion of the attorney for the Government shall be taken as true in so far as the allegation contained therein goes and with reference to that matter, and yet the party defendant has a full trial upon the entire issue, and no judgment by default goes against him by reason of his failure to produce such book. Therefore I say that if it comes under the act of 1789 it is much better for the merchant that we have this section than to leave it to stand upon the statute of 1789.

But, Mr. President, I humbly submit that no man who honestly proposes to discharge his duties under our revenue laws can make any objection to this section. It is not, as my good friend from Pennsylvania suggested, a case where a mere informer comes and takes the books; it is not a case where a committee from this body goes and takes the books without any judicial order; but it is a case where the whole matter being made known to the court, sitting indifferent between the Government and the person charged, the motion being made and all the facts presented, the court determines in its discretion that the book and papers ought to be produced, not necessarily in every case where the allegations have been made, but where the court can see that for the furtherance of justice it ought to be done.

I want to suggest also that this section expressly exempts from its operation criminal cases, and I have a very great doubt whether under the act of 1789 you can extend it beyond those cases that are purely cases at law; I take it that section was intended to extend to the trial of cases at law the rules that obtained with reference to the production of books and papers in equity cases; but where you have a case that is quasi criminal or an action to recover a penalty, I think it is exceedingly doubtful whether the act of 1789 would extend to it; and it seems to me that we ought to have a provision as against those persons who are disposed to evade our revenue laws and not act honestly, by which we can get hold of their books and papers.

As I have already suggested, I think the danger is that we shall go to the other extreme; that because we have prejudice now against informers and the wholesale seizure of books, which has obtained within the last twelve months, we shall go so far that it will be next to impossible to execute our revenue laws where there have been evasions or attempted evasions of them.

I beg Senators to look at this section and to look at it carefully. I think there is infinite danger that we shall impair largely the efficiency of the execution of this statute unless we retain this section. I think we are in very great danger of going to the other extreme. If we leave the statute as it stands now and it shall be sufficient to cover the cases that are contemplated by this bill, then the effect of it will be infinitely worse upon the importer or the man who is charged with an evasion of the statute than it will be or possibly can be under this section of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as the chairman of the committee has already stated, this section received as much, if not more, consideration in committee than any other section of the bill; and I desire to say a few words both upon the section itself and upon the general subject which has given rise to it.

I think, as the Senator from Iowa has said, we are perhaps in danger of going to extremes upon both sides of this question in consequence of recent events. Public feeling has been very much excited over the allegation that books and papers have been arbitrarily seized with bad motives in many cases, and on the other hand complaint is made that dishonest persons have violated the revenue laws against whom no penalties can be enforced unless there be just such an arbitrary seizure as is complained of. I think there have been many violations of the revenue law which have never been detected or punished; but I do not agree that it is necessary in order to reach them that arbitrary seizures should be resorted to.

The principal case out of which this feeling has arisen has been generally denounced as an arbitrary seizure of books and papers. I refer to the case in which the books of Phelps, Dodge & Co. were inspected in New York; and for the purpose of ascertaining the true position both of the man who has been denounced for that seizure and of the firm which is alleged to have been wronged by it, I have looked into the testimony relating to the production of those books; and I deem it my duty here to do justice to both parties involved in that transaction, and in the light of its facts make the effort to determine what legislation is required by true public policy.

No man in this country enjoys a higher reputation than William E. Dodge, and I hold that it is hardly worth while for a man to make a good reputation through a long life unless he is to get the benefit of it both in his private affairs and when arraigned as a wrong-doer before the public. It would take a very strong statement from any quarter, sustained by the most undoubted evidence, before I would be willing to impute for a moment any actual or intended violation or evasion of the laws of his country by a man who has sustained and who, as I believe, has deserved the reputation which Mr. Dodge enjoys.

But, Mr. President, upon looking at the transaction by which it is alleged a great wrong upon him was perpetrated, I find that his books were not seized, in the ordinary sense of that word, at all; but the special agent, Jayne, whose acts have been the cause of so much public comment, looking back for five years over the invoices furnished to him by a dishonest clerk in the house of William E. Dodge & Co., found a large number of undervaluations upon these invoices, as was alleged—undervaluations which no man who examines the whole case will suppose were made for the purpose of defrauding the revenue. The same books from which those undervaluations were taken would have shown invoices upon which overvaluations were made to an amount as large as the undervaluations, and the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. there is no doubt paid to the Government as much revenue upon the overvaluations in their invoices as the Government was deprived of by those which had undervaluations in them. But this clerk, let his motive be what it might, furnished to Jayne, the special agent, the invoices which showed the undervaluations, withholding those which showed the overvaluations, and upon the face of them Jayne found that the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. would be liable, upon a strict construction of the revenue laws, to penalties which would amount to about $1,750,000, being a forfeiture of the whole valuation of all the invoices in which the undervaluations of a few articles had occurred.

Finding this to be the case a suit was instituted, and notice sent to Mr. Dodge of what this agent had found. It came upon him, as he says, like a thunder-bolt; and no man can wonder that it did. No man holding the position which he did in society could be otherwise than alarmed and astounded at being charged with a fraud upon his Government of this extent. He went into the presence of this special agent, in a place which he describes as a dark hole in the custom-house lighted up by gas, and there with the district attorney present he was informed of what was charged against his firm, that they had imported goods with invoices in which undervaluations occurred that would make them subject to these penalties. Mr. Dodge is an honorable man. He averred that he was guiltless, that his firm and every member of it was guiltless, of an intention to defraud the Government; but upon this statement being made to him that their books and papers would show this undervaluation, and a charge being made, according to his statement, in language and spirit certainly discreditable to this man Jayne, and under circumstances calculated to inspire terror, he as an honorable merchant, instead of awaiting the process of having his books ordered into court, proffered to waive all the formalities the law required and place his books at the disposition of Mr. Jayne and of the district attorney. They were then carted away from his store without any judicial order, but upon his own agreement that they should be taken.

Unwilling to go into court where upon the technical letter of the law without any dishonest intention his firm might be subjected to a penalty of over $1,000,000, smarting under the allegation of fraud which was made public and sent abroad to Europe, under which his firm there was suffering, under which one of the members was suffering in reputation and mentally—such suffering as can be appreciated only by a high-toned, honorable man who has had his character blasted before the public—with all these considerations pressing upon him, rather than go into court and incur the risk of paying a penalty of $1,700,000 for a technical violation of law where no fraud was intended, he paid a penalty equal to the actual valuation of the goods upon which the undervaluation took place. The actual valuation of the goods, remember; not simply the duties upon them. The duties, if I recollect aright, and I will not be responsible for exact figures, upon the whole undervaluation would only have amounted to $1,600. The items of actual undervaluation amounted, in a business of five years covering between three and four hundred millions of dollars, to only about $6,000; upon goods which in the aggregate amounted to $271,000, and the case was compromised by his paying that amount.

Mr. President, it was a gross wrong; but the wrong was in the law. We are seeking to remedy it. We are seeking now to make the forfeiture, where there is an undervaluation, apply only to the goods actually undervalued, the items actually undervalued.

Mr. President, I am not here to apologize for this man Jayne; I am not here to become the advocate of any party in this transaction; but I am here to do justice to both these parties, and to see what provision we ought to insert in the public law for the purpose at the same time of protecting the honest merchant, of punishing the dishonest, of collecting the revenues, and imposing and enforcing the penalties and forfeitures that are incurred by actual intentional fraud.

We therefore meet the question, how are those who actually violate the law to be reached? How is the evidence against them to be supplied? The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] says, and very truly, that a law has been upon our statute-books since 1789 which authorizes the production of books; but he read that statute, and it applies only to cases where the production of documents would be enforced by a court of chancery. It is a well-settled rule that wherever a party is required to produce documents in a chancery proceeding, he is not bound to answer the rule upon him to produce those documents where it would have a tendency to criminate him, or to render him liable to a pecuniary forfeiture. So that under the act of 1789 if the application were made in a United States court to compel a merchant to produce his books for the purpose of establishing his liability to a pecuniary forfeiture, the court would not order him to produce them.

What, then, was the practice from 1789 until we had the first statute on the books in relation to this subject? I do not know whether it be correct or not, but I confess I have been surprised in view of all that has been said upon the subject of producing books and papers within the last few months or within the last year to find what is testified to as having been the practice under all administrations and at all times down to 1863. Let me read it. It is from the testimony of this man Jayne himself. I read from House Miscellaneous Document No. 264, being the report of the investigation before the Committee on Ways and Means:

Prior to 1863 the practice of the United States was for any collector of a district—

Mark it, Mr. President, not a judge, not a magistrate—

Prior to 1863 the practice of the United States was for any collector of a district to issue his warrant or procure a warrant from a justice of the peace, directed to any subordinate officer, and to take possession of the books and papers of any importing house. The books and papers were not protected in any form or shape. Now, I notice in the bills that have been prepared and referred to the committee, that most of them refer to the taking of the private books and papers of merchants. I wish to say to the committee that the distinction between the private books and papers and the books and papers of the merchant referring to his transactions with the United States Government is as distinct as daylight and darkness; that in law, or in theory of law, the books and papers relating to importations, to which the Government is a party, are not private books and papers. The collector of any district has had the right from time immemorial to summon any importer. He has had a right to issue his warrant to any subordinate to go and bring the importer's books into his presence, to be kept as long as he in his discretion should deem necessary. In 1863 Congress threw around importers protection which they had never before had under the law.

Mr. President, if that was the proceeding I am amazed that the clamor had not arisen long before the seizure of the books of Phelps, Dodge & Co. That the books and papers of an importing merchant should be subject to the mere motion of a collector, or that a justice of the peace should be moved by the prompting of a collector to seize the books or papers of a merchant is a statement which is so much more alarming than any that is now proposed in this section, so much more alarming than any that has been incorporated in the act of 1863, 1866, or 1867, that all these provisions are mercy and charity and justice compared to what is said here to have been the proceedings before 1863.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he considers that Mr. Jayne was authority to speak upon the subject of the practice prior to 1863? The Senator is aware that Mr. Jayne had nothing to do with the customs revenue until 1869; he had no connection with it. Now, I may say as against that, that there was quite a carefully prepared brief upon the memoranda of law and authorities touching this matter of seizing books and papers presented to the Committee on Finance by Mr. Eaton, of New York; and in speaking of the action of the courts under the law of 1799 he declared:

The furthest that any court has ever gone against this principle—

That is, the principle of compelling a man to give testimony that will injure himself, either to subject him to penalty or bring him into dispute—

prior to the enactment of the seizure law, in 1863, was in a case in which Mr. Justice Nelson delivered the opinion, holding that where a claimant of merchandise sued for a fraudulent violation of the revenue-law, has the burden of proof imposed upon him by the court, according to the seventy-first section of the collection act of 1799, (1 Statutes at Large, page 627,) it is no error for the judge to instruct the jury that if such claimant refuses to produce his books and papers as an evidence of his accounts and transactions with the parties abroad from whom the goods were purchased, then the jury were at liberty to presume that his books and papers would have operated unfavorably on his case if produced.

And as to the United States courts, a case is stated in this brief, The United States vs. Twenty-eight packages of pins, (Gilpin's Reports, 312,) in which Judge Hopkinson, with this act and acting under it, declared:

The courts of the United States have the power given to them to require parties to produce books and writings in their possession or power which contain evidence pertinent to the issue in the case, and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same "by the ordinary rules of proceedings in chancery." Is this such a case? Would a court of chancery, on a bill of discovery, compel a party to produce evidence which would subject him to a forfeiture? I think not. No such order has been shown from a court of equity, and the authorities hold a different doctrine.

Now, I submit to the Senator from Pennsylvania, in view of these cases, that have been not only so closely contested but have been the subject of such close judicial investigation, that the exceedingly careful, restrained language of so venerable and learned a judge as Judge Nelson would have considered the very limit of his power that the jury were to allow the non-production of the books to weigh unfavorably against a party who could have produced them, whether such a practice as this man Jayne speaks of could have been possible. It is not a question touching his personal credibility; it is a question touching his capacity on any ground to be a witness in regard to the law and the practice under a law long prior to the time when he came upon the field as a special agent. He did not come into—I will not say the public service—but he did not take office until 1869, and the law which he acted under was passed in 1863 and amended in 1867, and he is speaking in that testimony, as I understand my friend from Pennsylvania to say, of a condition of law and practice under it which existed long prior to 1863 and supposed to be justified by the act of 1789. I do not think any weight can be given to Mr. Jayne as a witness, or that his testimony is entitled to weight before the country as to what happened prior to 1863.

Mr. SCOTT. I will not stop at this point to discuss with the Senator from Delaware the credibility of this witness. I find this statement in the testimony given by him. I find upon looking through this book that quite a number of the most distinguished merchants, and if I mistake not one or two gentlemen who had hitherto been collectors of the port of New York, were before this committee while this man was giving his testimony. He makes a statement here as to the fact as to how this jurisdiction was exercised, and I do not find any contradiction of that in any other part of the testimony taken before the same committee. I was simply adverting to it for the purpose of remarking that if this had been the practice, it is remarkable that long prior to the present time such a practice had not given rise to such complaints as we have been hearing within the last year or two.

That brings me, however, to the act of 1863. I have already been induced to make many more remarks on this general subject than I intended. I rose more for the purpose of inquiring what position we would be left in if there be no provision of this character in the law, as would be the case if we strike out this amendment upon the motion of the Senator from Delaware. Now, having spoken of the act of 1789, and shown that it is inapplicable, having spoken of this alleged practice as sworn to by this witness, I come to the enactment of 1863, and let me comment upon that very briefly. What did it provide for? Upon the affidavit of any fraud at any time attempted or committed at any port, the district judge of any district—not simply the one in which the fraud was attempted or committed, but the district judge of any district in the United States—a judge sitting at New Orleans might issue his warrant for a fraud attempted or committed at Portland or at New York—shall forthwith issue his warrant, directed to the collector of the port at which the fraud was committed or attempted, directing him, his agents or assistants, to enter any place where such books, &c., are deposited, to take and carry away the same to be inspected, and to be retained so long as necessary.

There was the provision of the act of 1863 which authorized upon an affidavit a warrant to issue to any part of the United States and it authorized, without any opportunity of the party who was charged with having attempted or committed the fraud to show cause, the seizure at once and the carrying away of books, papers, documents, &c., to be inspected and to be retained so long as necessary. These were arbitrary provisions; they were indefensible provisions. I think they were at war with the very spirit of our Constitution and of our institutions, and the wonder is that they were permitted to remain on the statute-book as long as they did.

The only material modification of them prior to the act of 1867 was that by the act of 18th of July, 1866, which provided that when these documents were to be procured a warrant should be directed to any collector of customs in whose district the books, &c., may be; and it made that much of a modification. The warrant was to be directed to the collector of the district in which the books may be; so that it took away the burdensome provision allowing books to be taken in New York for the purpose of being inspected in New Orleans or elsewhere.

Then came the act of 1867, and it confines the complaint of frauds committed within that district, and omits frauds attempted. Then it provides that a warrant is to issue to the marshal, not to the collector, who is to take possession of them and produce them before the judge, who shall allow an examination of the same by the collector or any officer authored by him, and they were to be retained. But—and here was a great amelioration—oath was to be made of such papers as were wanted, of the character of the fraud, of the specific imputation, and the documents that were alleged to be necessary to sustain them has to be specified. That was the act of 1867, and that was the act which was in force at the time these alleged atrocities were committed; and that is the act which is in force now. That act of 1867 repealed the previous act of 1863.

Now, Mr. President, instead of either repealing or leaving that act of 1867 in force, what do we propose to do? Remembering that the moieties, the fines, the penalties which these agents are entitled to share in are reduced by this bill to the cases of actual smuggling, remembering that there is no longer the great inducements operating upon them which heretofore did operate upon them for the purpose of producing these forfeitures, we now take this power and place it in the hands of the prosecuting officer of the Government and of the courts. It must be upon his suggestion to the court, not on the mere suggestion that books and papers will be useful if they are produced for the purpose of establishing a forfeiture against a certain merchant, but that suggestion must contain what the fraud was, what the specific books and papers are that will prove the issue, and upon that suggestion the books are not seized, but a notice goes to the man who is charged with this fraud, and a copy of this suggestion and a copy of the notice is served upon him informing him of what he is charged with, and that upon a certain day he will be required to appear in court and say whether he has such books; if he has, whether he will produce them; if he has the books, why he will not produce them if he refuses, and providing that if after a hearing the court shall be satisfied that these books ought to be produced and shall make such an order, the failure to produce them shall be taken as a confession of these charges.

Now, Mr. President, I submit that this is the very provision which an honest and honorable merchant ought to wish, and the Senator from Ohio has already read a letter from one of the most distinguished merchants in New York saying that the merchants of that city are satisfied with it. It takes away the odious feature that formerly existed of anything like an arbitrary search or seizure. It is an application in open court for a notice in the nature of a rule to show cause to the party charged, giving him information of what he is charged with, of the specific offense, of the forfeiture that is incurred, of the manner in which it was committed, of the books which it is alleged he has, or of the documents it is alleged he has, and saying on such a day and at such an hour in court you will be called upon to show cause why these books if you have them ought not to be produced.

And it is only after all these proceedings that if the judge be satisfied it is right to require the production of the books, their production is ordered. The Senator from Delaware says to me that there is no rule to show cause required. It is not in name or in terms a rule to show cause; but what is it? It is a suggestion of the attorney that "in his belief any business book, invoice, or paper, belonging to or under the control of the defendant or claimant, will tend to prove any allegation made by the United States," and then he "may make a written motion, particularly describing such book, invoice, or paper, and setting forth the allegation which he expects to prove. Thereupon the court in which suit or proceeding is pending may, at its discretion," and only if the court is satisfied upon the inspection of this suggestion that it is proper; it is not mandatory; the notice does not go as of course; it is in the discretion of the court—"may at its discretion issue a notice to the defendant or claimant to produce such book, invoice, or paper, in court, at a day and hour to be specified in said notice, which, together with a copy of said motion, shall be served formally on the defendant or claimant by the United States marshal by delivering to him a certified copy thereof, or otherwise serving the same as original notices of subpœna in the same court are served; and if the defendant or claimant shall fail to produce such book, invoice, or paper in obedience to such notice, the allegations stated in the said motion shall be taken as confessed unless his failure to produce the same shall be explained to the satisfaction of the court."

The notice is "produce the book." He comes and has the opportunity of saying why he cannot or why he will not produce the book, and if that is not satisfactory to the court, then it is taken as confessed; and although it is not in terms a rule to show cause, the motion and the notice and the discretion given to the court, both as to whether the notice shall issue and as to whether the answer given is a reason why they should not be produced, amount in substance to the ordinary rule to show cause why they should not be produced. Anxious as I am to throw guards around such men as those who have been the victims of our law on this subject, to protect such reputations as have been soiled by these proceedings heretofore, instead of seeing in this section any provision against which such men should complain, I think it is a provision of which they would gladly avail themselves. The honest importer has nothing to fear from that provision, while it is one which will enable the customs officers in good faith to enforce the revenue laws against those who wish to evade them and to avoid their penalties.

Mr. President, having said this much on the subject, more than I intended, I trust that this fifth section as it now stands in the bill will not be stricken out, for, while we should not again have special agents rummaging back for five years through the papers of honest merchants through the agency of dishonest clerks for the purpose of enforcing penalties for a technical violation of the law, we ought to see that actual, willful violations of it shall be punished, and that the proper evidence to procure and enforce that punishment shall be placed in the hands of the officers of the Government and of the courts which administer the laws.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, upon the general question of abolishing moieties, I expressed an official opinion more than four years ago in my annual report as Secretary of the Treasury to Congress in the year 1869. I thought then that I foresaw some of the evils of which complaint has since been made. On the 25th of May, 1870, I submitted to Congress a bill for the abolition of the moiety system, coupled with a bill to establish the salaries of the custom-house officers; and again in 1870 I urged the abolition of the moiety system; and I think experience has shown that either of those years would have been a more fortunate time for the consideration of the subject than the present. While I have seen many things and experienced a good deal which would lead me to change my opinion, I think that the moiety system is a bad system and ought to be abolished. Nor is that opinion derived altogether or even chiefly from what are alleged to be the evils under which the commercial community suffers, but rather from a knowledge of the evils that it brings upon the administration of the law and the difficulties and dangers to which those who are called to administer it are exposed.

This section which the committee have reported seems to me a judicious one, and therefore I shall support it. I have been reluctant even to say one word before the public touching any matter concerning which I have been officially concerned, and I do not know that I should have risen this morning except for the remarks made by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I have no judgment to express as to the character and conduct of the firm whose name he has mentioned in the presence of the Senate; but I wish to lay before the Senate certain facts which I think relieve not partially but altogether, which justify not only with qualification and apology, but without qualification or apology, what was done in reference to the claim that was made upon that firm. Personally I have nothing of which I can complain. I believe that the senior member of that firm in whatever he has said, either in private or in public, has been altogether favorable to the part I had in the transaction to which public attention has been directed. But the vindication of the course of administration is of more consequence than the vindication of any private person.

What were the facts? On the 27th day of December, 1872, or perhaps a few days prior to that date, a person who had been in the employ of this house, having first been to an attorney in the city of New York not in any way connected with the Government or representing it, came to the special agent and laid before him what he called evidence of the undervaluation of goods imported by this house. He not only made statements, but he presented documents which went to show the truth of his statements, and when these documents were compared with the books of the house after they had been surrendered for the purpose of examination, the evidence was conclusive that those papers had not been tampered with in any way, that they were originals, that they were genuine, that they had been taken from the books of this firm by this man; and whatever may have been his motive or whatever the character you may attribute to him, it has never been proved—I think not even suggested, but if suggested never sustained by any proof—that the agent of the Treasury Department had any knowledge of the relations of this clerk to this house until he appeared before him with these papers, and after having consulted with counsel whom he had privately employed and who was in no way connected with the Government.

What was this special agent to do? I have before me a statement which contains a minute of thirty-six shipments of goods—tin plates—commencing early in January, 1871, ending in March, 1872, upon different vessels, or perhaps in some instances shipments upon the same vessels on different voyages. Each one of those shipments shows a difference between the custom-house invoice on which duties were paid and the private invoice in the same handwriting with the regular invoice presented by this clerk to the special agent, and when compared with the stubs from which they were torn matched exactly with the books then in possession of the firm. When these books were given up on the 27th day of December, 1872, by consent, what was the special agent to do? Attribute to him any character you please; with this statement before him of thirty-six shipments of tin with a public invoice found at the custom-house, with a private invoice in the same handwriting obtained confessedly from the books of this establishment, what was he to do? Can anybody say that he was to do anything except to proceed in the regular way? If he had done otherwise he would have been condemned by the whole country. The matter was laid before the district-attorney, and the district-attorney, acting upon his authority not as an officer of the Treasury Department, but as an officer of the Department of Justice, instituted regular proceedings for the recovery of what was alleged to be due under the law upon a computation not at the will of any officer, but taking the facts as they appeared he proceeded to compute, establish, and ascertain the legal liability of the defendants.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question. I desire to know if that agent of the Treasury Department is the same officer who has recently resigned his place?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly; Mr. Jayne—the same person. I do not speak of Mr. Jayne one way or the other either in defense or condemnation. I only state the facts. Legal proceedings were instituted for $271,000. About this time—I cannot say what the precise date was—Mr. Dodge called upon me in Washington at my boarding-house, and stated in general the difficulty in which he was involved, and alleging his innocence, of which I had no doubt, he excited my unreserved sympathy upon the representation he made of the difficulty in which his house was involved. He desired to pay the $271,000 at once and have the whole matter disposed of then and there. I said to him: "This is an impossible thing, an improper, a very unwise thing for you to think of." Upon his assertions of his innocence, I gave him what I thought good advice as far as I could give advice as a public officer; I said to him: "If your statements are true, as I have no doubt, you are in no danger either as to money or reputation. Go into court where the testimony can be taken under oath and according to the forms of law. The Secretary of the Treasury has no power; he cannot take testimony; he cannot form a legal judgment. This case can only be disposed of properly in the judicial tribunals of the country, and if it shall turn out, as I have no doubt it will, that these are technical departures from the law and do not involve any criminal intent, the court will so certify; and the Secretary of the Treasury under the statute has power to remit the penalty in whole or in part, and such things are frequently done." Mr. Dodge has said since that I gave him good advice. I gave him such advice as I thought a man in his situation should take. He came a second time and I repeated the advice to him, but declined to have anything to do with the adjustment of the matter as it was in the courts and must be there disposed of.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me? I would be glad at this point if he would permit me to read Mr. Dodge's statment on this subject and giving his reason why the advice given him was not followed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no objection to that, although I suppose I know the reason.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts will be glad to have this read. Mr. Dodge states:

And now, before I forget it, I want to do justice to a Government officer who, I think, is entitled to have justice done him in this case. I have regretted very much that from time to time, ever since the settlement, there have appeared in the papers certain hints which would seem to indicate that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, did not treat us fairly in the matter. If we had followed Mr. BOUTWELL'S advice we probably never should have paid this $271,000. I came on to see Mr. BOUTWELL. He was sick at his house, and was kind enough to receive me in his room. I stated the whole case to him as well as I could in a very short time, and I told Mr. BOUTWELL that we had looked this matter over with great care; that if it was a matter between ourselves and the Government, or if it was simply a matter between the courts of the United States and ourselves, and if it were not for the array of power and influence which was behind to make the better appear the worse, we would not hesitate to go into court; but for us to go into court and have a judgment against us for $1,750,000 and to have it telegraphed all over the world that the Government of the United States had sued Phelps, Dodge & Co. for fraud, and had obtained a judgment for that amount, whatever might be the result afterward, the injury to us as merchants would have been irreparable. Because, however swift the fact may go by telegraph, the result of an after-investigation would be very slow to follow. Mr. BOUTWELL said to me, "Mr. Dodge, I think you had better go before the court, and I will assure you that if it comes back to me, as it will come, whatever may be the decision of the court, I will give the matter personal and careful consideration." I thanked him for it. He knew then probably what I did not know, but which if I had known I never would have paid the money. I had no knowledge that there was only $1,600 involved in the whole case, running over five years and covering importations to the amount of $50,000,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not then know how much was involved. I had received no official report of the case at that time. I had only heard a rumor that there was such a case.

Following these interviews there was a correspondence between Mr. Dodge's counsel, Mr. Wakeman, of New York, who was an eminent revenue lawyer, who had been I think four or five years surveyor of the port and who had frequently appeared before the Department in revenue cases. He appeared in relation to the adjustment of this case. The first proposition made was dated on the 2d of January, 1873, and the two subsequent propositions bore the date of 2d January, 1873, but they were not made until some time afterward. They seem to have been dated back to correspond with the first proposition. This first was a proposition to pay $271,000, and was coupled with a protestation of innocence. We said in reply that it was impossible for the Department to take money for an alleged violation of the revenue laws when those who were charged with having violated them, and who proposed to pay money upon such charges, themselves protested their innocence, that the Government could not take money from hands that were innocent of any intention to defraud the Government. Therefore that proposition was declined.

A second proposition came in which the protestation of innocence was omitted, no admission of guilt inserted, but the protestation of innocence was omitted; and while that proposition was under consideration it was withdrawn before the Department had acted upon it or come to any conclusion as to what should be done. After its withdrawal a letter was addressed by Mr. Dodge himself to the Secretary of the Treasury saying that he had been informed that the Secretary had already reached the conclusion to accept the proposition, and inasmuch as he had made the proposition and the Department had concluded to accept it, he upon the whole had concluded to stand by it. I wrote him a letter, which I dictated personally, saying to him that the Department had come to no such conclusion, that indeed the facts necessary to an opinion were not before the Department, and that his withdrawal of his proposition was entirely consistent with the situation of the question as far as the Department was concerned.

But following that after an interval came a third proposition renewing the offer of $271,000, supported as all the others were by the recommendation of the district attorney of the southern district of New York in favor of accepting the proposition. This proposition either contained the suggestion or condition, or was accompanied or was soon followed by a letter containing the condition that the receipt should be a bar to all claims of the Government against this firm. That of course was inadmissible. We said that the Department could only accept this money as a bar in any civil suit to those cases which had been examined and reported upon; and that proposition was finally accepted in the amended form. The suit was for $271,000 and something over, and they consented to pay exactly what the Government asked. This was not a sudden thing. The proceedings were instituted on the 27th of December, 1872, or earlier than the 27th of December, for the books were delivered on that day of December. The final proceedings took place the very last of the month of February, 1873. Something like two months or more elapsed while the subject was under consideration. There was no pressure from the Treasury Department upon this house. We delayed, we resisted, we refused propositions, we postponed; they had time for consideration, they had eminent counsel, they acted upon their own judgment——

Mr. HOWE. Who represented them?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Wakeman, for one. I understood other counsel were employed. Mr. Wakeman was an eminent revenue officer, and by his letters and appearance at the Department, by his interviews with the officers of the Department, he manifested an interest in the affair equal to any which an attorney is expected to exhibit.

I have nothing to say about Phelps, Dodge & Co. with reference to this matter. I can understand and I believe Mr. Dodge himself is entirely free from any personal responsibility in this matter. But there is a mystery connected with these transactions. Through a period of more than a year there were undervaluations, invoices given at the custom-house on which duties were paid which did not correspond with private invoices in the books of this firm. Therefore while I do not judge them, I cannot offer anything in their defense; but I do say that the Treasury Department exhibited moderation and consistency. It extended to them not only the leniency which a merciful administration of the law would allow, but the Treasury Department did from the beginning to the end of the transaction delay and postpone the payment of this money, for I can assure the Senate and the country that for myself I was unwilling that a house having the reputation which this house had should pay into the Treasury of the United States $271,000. But what was to be done? After they had had two months for consideration, after we had made suggestions of ways in which this subject could be judicially investigated, when they three times offered to do what the officers of the law said the law required should be done, what was an executive officer of the law to do? Was he to say, "This money shall not be paid; you do not know your own business; you do not know your own condition?" After two months' delay, after they had had the benefit of eminent counsel, after they had had suggestions as to a different method of proceeding, and after they had not only been invited but compelled to go into the courts by the officers of the law and a way pointed out to them by the Secretary of the Treasury how they would escape from every penalty if the judge upon the hearing should say there was no criminal intent but only a technical violation of the law, what was the Treasury Department to do?

Mr. President, in this statement I have done more than I designed to do. I should probably have said nothing except for the remarks made by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but I believe that if the law was ever honestly administered, was ever mercifully administered, ever administered with reference to the rights of the defendants, if ever defendants were cautioned and put upon their guard, this was the case and these defendants were the parties.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not. At this stage of the session we must proceed with the public business. I shall insist on going on with the bill unless a majority of the Senate overrule me by a distinct vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Cameron, Chandler, Conover, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Mitchell, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Robertson, and Tipton—18.

NAYS—Messrs. So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance to be inserted as section 5.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamlin, Harvey, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Sherman, Windom, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Washburn—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Brownlow, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Ransom, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, and West—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section [4] 6, line 2, to strike out the words "furnishing information" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "claiming as informer;" so as to read:

SEC. [4] 6. That no payment shall be made to any person claiming as informer in any case wherein judicial proceedings shall have been instituted, unless his claim to compensation shall have been established to the satisfaction of the court or judge having cognizance of such proceedings, and the value of his services duly certified by said court or judge for the information of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this section as it stands. The first clause of it provides that the judge shall determine in certain cases when the person claiming as an informer shall be entitled to a compensation and the sum, "but no certificate of the value of such services shall be conclusive of the amount thereof." If you do not make it conclusive with the court you give an appeal to the Secretary, and in every case you will have an appeal lying from the court to the Secretary. This first clause is "where judicial proceedings have been instituted," where there has been a trial had, where the judge will know all the circumstances connected with the informer—and he will be better qualified to judge in that case than the Secretary of the Treasury can—what shall be the informer's share? You allow an appeal there, and you have then two parties with the jurisdiction, and you will have that appeal taken in every case. I therefore suggest to strike out the words "but no" in the eighth line and insert "which;" so as to read "which certificate of the value of such services, when not exceeding the limitations of this act"—for there is a limitation hereinbefore named—"shall be conclusive of the amount thereof."

Then the next clause makes the decision of the Secretary conclusive where the case is settled without legal action. I have had some conversation with the Senator from Massachusetts, and I believe he agrees with me in the propriety of an amendment. I would, to make it a little more specific, add after the word "services" in the sixth line the words "stated in the final order or decree made therein and;" so as to read:

To the satisfaction of the court or judge having cognizance of such proceedings, and the value of his services stated in the final order or decree made therein, and duly certified by said court or judge for the information of the Secretary of the Treasury, which certificate of the value of such services, when not exceeding the limitations in this act, shall be conclusive of the amount thereof.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would defer very much to the opinion of the Senator from Maine on a question of this kind, for he has himself enforced the customs laws; but this matter did not escape the observation of the committee, and the reason why we preferred to let the Secretary of the Treasury in all cases fix the amount was because there are some thirty or forty different judicial districts in the United States where there may be customs laws to be enforced, and we have more than that number of collection districts, and we thought there would be great diversity in the carrying out of this section in the distribution of this compensation if it was left to the courts alone to fix the amount. In one court the judge might give a very large sum, going up near to the limit fixed by law of one-half of the value of the goods, and other courts might allow a very small rate; and if their decision was final and conclusive as to the value and amount of service, it might be very difficult to administer the law.

These services are of a peculiar character. They are services as an informer. There is no fixed measure or standard of value. There is no fixed measure of damages as the value of an article, sold or the like, and it is very difficult therefore for the judge to determine the exact value of the service; but the judge may very properly state the circumstances, may make a kind of special finding, and his certificate of the value of the services may be sufficient, leaving the Secretary of the Treasury administering the revenue laws throughout the United States to apply general rules to this distribution. As a matter of course, all the money comes from the Treasury, and the Secretary must finally act on it in some form. He must draw the warrant and pay the money out. It seemed to us therefore that the House had acted wisely in allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to be the final arbiter in the distribution of this money. Still, if the Senator from Maine who is familiar with the collection laws and the Senator from Massachusetts, who at one time administered them, think it is better to let any court or any judge in any district pass finally upon all the facts in these cases, so that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have nothing to do but issue his warrant for what they find to be due, be it so, though it seems to me not to be a wise but rather a dangerous provision. It would probably lead to the expenditure of a greater sum of money than would be the case under the provisions of the bill.

Besides, the amount of the appropriation is limited by law. The Secretary of the Treasury may award the sums to be paid out according to the amount appropriated by Congress, whereas the courts may not know anything about the distribution of this fund. Here we have appropriated $100,000 to cover these cases. The court may award $500,000, or $200,000, or $300,000, there being no limit except one-half the value of the goods seized in the process of smuggling.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a limit of $5,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that is enormous taking the number of cases of smuggling that occur, and $100,000 would not pay for many cases at that rate. I can see that there are great difficulties, and I think Senators when they come to reflect will see that it is not wise to leave the courts determine the amount in all cases, but that their finding should be subject to final distribution by the Secretary. Still, if Senators think it better to do this, I shall not interpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio, the Senator from Maine, and the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that in the haste with which this bill seems to have been prepared, here is a case in the present section not provided for at all, and which I suppose is one of the cases that most frequently occur. Provision is here made that one claiming as informer may be paid in two cases, one where judicial proceedings were instituted and a trial or examination had before a court, and the other where no judicial proceedings occur at all. What is to be said of all the cases where a suit is commenced and the party appears and unwilling to litigate either gives a cognovit or allows judgment to go by default, the court never seeing or knowing anything about it; in such cases, which would be upon the doctrine of chances the most flagrant, the most guilty, an informer could receive nothing as I see under either provision of this section. First, "no payment shall be made to any person claiming as informer in any case wherein judicial proceedings shall have been instituted, unless his claim to compensation shall have been established to the satisfaction of the court or judge having cognizance of such proceedings." A writ issues; a proceeding in rem, if you please; and the party appears and gives a cognovit, does not defend at all; judgment is taken by default. What judge knows anything about that? How is it ever to get into any court by which the judge can be informed so that he can fix the compensation? That case would not be within the first part of this section, and certainly it would not be within the latter part.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator look at the language again? "In any case wherein judicial proceedings shall have been instituted." How could there be a cognovit unless judicial proceedings are pending, and the judgment is founded on the admission of the party?

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend was amusing himself by a conference with another Senator in place of paying the slightest attention to what I said, or he would not have asked that question. Let me state the case again. Of course if a suit is commenced and the party goes into court, and with or without a hearing a judgment is rendered, the Senator may stretch this language as he suggests to cover that case. I put to him the case where a man's goods are seized; nothing goes except that process, whatever it may be, upon which a seizure takes place; there judicial proceedings are instituted, are they not? The case goes no further. Will the Senator tell me how the judge is to know anything about it, a judge of that court when the case is never on the docket, no attention ever called to it, no pleading is ever presented to him, when nobody is even heard before him? How is the judge going to know the merits of one claiming as an informer who will come to the Secretary of the Treasury and say, "Why, I gave the district attorney the information upon which he seized those one hundred tubs of butter; he sent a man to seize them on information I gave him, and I come here to claim a share as informer." The Secretary takes up this section of the law and says: "Which class of people do you belong to? Have you any certificate from the judge?" "No; this never went into court at all; judicial proceedings were instituted but nothing was done by the court, and therefore I have not a certificate." The Secretary says, "Then I cannot pay you anything because judicial proceedings were instituted; the case does not enable you to get and you have not got the certificate of a judge because there was no trial or hearing before him, and therefore how can I pay you at all?"

Mr. SHERMAN. As I understand the section I do not see the difficulty the Senator from New York does. This is intended to divide all these classes of cases into two. Where proceedings are instituted, as a matter of course there must be a finding by the court, and this forbids the Secretary of the Treasury from interfering with a case in which the courts have jurisdiction. Practically it forbids the settlement of that class of cases where suits are pending and instituted, prevents the parties from settling them, and prevents anybody from receiving money in a case once commenced in court until it has been prosecuted so far that the informer can get a certificate from the judge showing him entitled to so much.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand my friend to mean that if a suit is commenced and the party does not appear to answer at all, allows the goods which have been seized to be sold, the alleged informer in such a case can or cannot go to a judge of the court in in which the proceeding was instituted, and obtain a certificate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that in such a case, where judicial proceedings have been commenced in the court, and the court has taken cognizance of the proceeding, the judge must upon the papers before him certify whether or not there was a proper case, and certify the value of the services to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CONKLING. On what evidence is the judge to certify that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The informer must furnish sufficient evidence to show that he is entitled to something; otherwise nobody gets any money. The case having once been instituted in court, it must be prosecuted until the certificate of the judge is obtained that it was properly instituted and properly prosecuted. I ask the Senator from Maine if he understands it as I do?

Mr. HAMLIN. I understand it precisely as the Senator from Ohio does. The first provision in this section applies to those cases where judicial proceedings have been instituted. In all cases where judicial proceedings have been instituted the first clause in the section covers them, and the amount due to the informer is to be determined by the court. In all cases where judicial proceedings have not been instituted, the question is to be determined by the Secretary. Now judicial proceedings have or have not been instituted. There are but two classes of cases. If there be proceedings instituted and then dropped by default, in what manner shall the person claiming to be informer obtain a certificate of the court? The process can be instituted only by the district attorney upon the information furnished by the collector of the port, and it is to the collector of the port that the information is given, and through the collector of the port and with the aid of the informer he will be bound to furnish the judge with that evidence which will show first that he is an informer and second what would be a proper sum to allow him. That would be my understanding of it, and I have no doubt of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if I may be allowed to make a remark, I am clearly against the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, and I think the committee were manifestly wise in the way they have reported the section. If the Senator from Maine is right now in supposing that when an informer has given information to a collector proceedings are taken, no part of which ever comes within the view of any court or judge, then under this section the informer is to go and get up ex parte, by affidavit or otherwise, the evidence, as the Senator calls it, which he is to present to the judge so as to secure a certificate of the judge upon that, no proceedings ever having passed in review before him, the estimate which the judge sets upon his services should not be made conclusive, as my honorable friend from Maine proposes. I was inclined at first to vote for his amendment because I supposed it would apply to cases which had been tried or heard, which were on the docket, which were open in some sense to judicial inspection. But if it be true that an informer who lives at Dunkirk in the State of New York is to go down to Judge Wallace who lives two or three hundred miles off, at chambers, carry him a bundle of papers consisting of his own affidavit or whatever they may be, and ask him to look at those papers and refer him to this section of the law and fix what he ought to be paid as an informer, in that case I understand it would get to be a game of legs and bounce. Any informer who was pertinacious and cunning enough and knew law enough to present a plausible case could secure what he chose, unless you appoint somebody to step on his heels all the while, to go after him and detect him and undeceive the judge of all the impositions which ex parte he may put upon him. Virtually the judge would be at the mercy of the informer.

Then I think the committee are wise in saying that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have the right to review that, and not be bound hand and foot by any partial, although not consciously partial certificate which might be obtained by an informer from a judge having absolutely no knowledge whatever in regard to the case except what the informer might see fit to give him.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator has not well considered the point which he has made. If he had, I am very sure he would not have made it. The judge is to be in possession of no information except such as he is furnished with by the collector and the informer. I take it it all comes through the collector. Therefore it would be improper in cases that are not actually tried to give the judge jurisdiction; and why? Because from Dunkirk to some other place the informer will travel down with a large bundle of papers, ex parte affidavits, and present them to that judge, and upon those papers he is to get his proportion as informer, and in no other way, and therefore the opinion of the judge ought not to be conclusive. Does my friend recollect that that is precisely the way the bill leaves it for the Secretary of the Treasury to act? The Secretary of the Treasury is to have no earthly knowledge as to how this money to the informer shall be distributed except that which is furnished him by the collector and the informer. I hold that if the amendment which I have offered is adopted you will secure first the opinion of the court in the case where there shall have been an actual trial. If the amendment is not adopted you will not get the opinion of the court in that case as conclusive. You will get it then, you will get it in the other case precisely in the same way that it would be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury if it be not furnished to the court. I think that is a conclusive answer to the suggestion the Senator makes.

This is a matter which I care not a fig about. I do not believe it is wise to have two bodies here with an appellate jurisdiction from one to the other, when in most cases the one party will have a judicial proceeding before him and can better judge of the manner of distributing the money than can the Secretary of the Treasury with this bunch of papers that the informer will travel with from Dunkirk to the Secretary of the Treasury to inform him. I think it would be better; I think there would be more justice, and the rules applied would be more equitable and more uniform. However, it is a matter of no great importance.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Maine says he has made a conclusive answer to my suggestion. Whether he has or not, I will leave to him when I state a fact. The fallacy in the argument of my honorable friend, as very often occurs with the greatest logicians, is in the premises and not in the reasoning. He says that the Secretary of the Treasury would have before him the same matter, and nothing else, as the court. Having taken that for his premises he argues most conclusively that therefore he would not know any more about it than the court. I take issue with him upon the fact and I offset his statement with my own to this effect: When an informer has gone ex parte before a judge who is burdened with many things and cannot sit down to issue citations, even if he had authority to do it, to all concerned to come in and contradict, and when he did get this ex parte certificate from the judge and then is compelled to send it to the Secretary of the Treasury, what may the Secretary do? Is the Senator warranted in saying that he is to sit down on this certificate and the papers on which it is granted, and shut his eyes to everything else? On the contrary it is referred to the proper clerk, and if the Department is administered as I presume it is and will be, it will become the duty of that clerk to write to the district attorney, to write to anybody else, if there is a special agent or whoever it may, to tell him to inquire about this, and it turns out that there is another side to it, if it turns out that in place of all this information coming from this pretended informer the district attorney had knowledge otherwise, that other people had knowledge otherwise, that there is really no merit in what the claimant has done, the Secretary of the Treasury may say that as the judge might say it if the facts were before him, and if the judge had a bevy of clerks and he could touch a bell and have the proper clerk come before him and hand the papers over to him and say write to Mr. District Attorney, and write to this, that, and the other man "and see what the answer to this is, and then I will pass upon it," I grant that the adjudication would be then about as valuable and substantial as it is likely to be in the case of the Secretary of the Treasury.

But on the other hand if the judicial officer without anybody to help him is to be applied to at chambers, plucked by the sleeve at any hour of the day when an applicant can catch him, and requested to look at these papers and give a certificate, and to do it hastily and certify the best that he can ex parte, it seems to me it would be a very considerable check and safeguard and a beneficial power of revision to have some time elapse and everybody know that that has gone to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Treasury able to correspond with the collectors, district attorneys, special agents, and representatives of the Government, whoever they may be, in order to see whether the whole truth was told to the judge or whether in reality sand was thrown in his eyes by the single person interested in the seizure.

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a mere controversy of words, but I do not want to leave it quite here. I want to say one word more to my friend from New York. I again affirm that precisely the same proceedings would be had before the judge as before the Secretary, only if there were an actual trial in court the judge would have the benefit of all the witnesses that might have been examined who might show who was or was not the informer.

I said that the matter would be presented by the collector and the informer to the judge. So it will, but it will be presented in all cases, as it always will, and always has been, and is now, by the district attorney. It is the every-day practice to-day that our courts do determine who is the informer, and they certify it to the Secretary here. I said the collector and the informer; I meant to say that they were the parties; but the legal officer to present the cases will be the district attorney.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The amendment was rejected.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section [5] 7, line 5, to insert between the words "this" and "act" the words "or any other."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [5] 7, line 17, to strike out the word "perpetual" before the word "right;" so as to read: "shall have a right of action against such officer," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section [6] 8, to strike out in lines 2 and 3 the words "interested in a part or share of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture incurred under the customs-revenue laws of the United States," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "claiming compensation under any provision of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 32) obviating the necessity of issuing patents for certain private land claims in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington; and

An act (S. No. 822) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," passed May 10, 1872.

THE REVISED STATUTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate at this time the bill (H. R. No. 3652) providing for publication of the revised statutes of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. I think that bill had better be read at length. I presume there will be no objection to it.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The first section authorizes the Secretary of State to employ a competent person to prepare the revised statutes for publication and superintend the printing of the same. The person so employed is to complete the head-notes, the special titles to chapters, and the marginal notes, referring to the original statutes from which each section was compiled and repealed by the revision, with references to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, explaining or expounding the same, and such decisions of State courts as he may deem expedient; and he is to make a full and complete index to the same, and to superintend the printing and see that the same is truly and accurately printed. The service is to be performed to the satisfaction and acceptance of the Secretary of State, and such sum shall be paid to the person so employed as the Secretary shall deem to be just and reasonable. When completed to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State, the Secretary is to duly certify the same under the seal of State, and when printed and promulgated as hereinafter provided, the printed volumes shall be legal evidence of the laws and treaties therein contained in all the courts of the United States and of the several States and Territories.

Section 2 provides that the revision of the statutes of a general and permanent nature, with the index thereto, shall be printed in one volume and shall be entitled and labeled "Revised Statutes of the United States," and the revision of the statutes relating to the District of Columbia, to post-roads, and the public treaties in force on the 1st day of December, 1873, with a suitable index to each, shall be published in a separate volume and entitled and labeled "Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, and Post-Roads, Public Treaties."

By section 3 the Secretary of State is directed to cause the two volumes to be stereotyped, and such number of each volume to be printed and substantially bound at the Government Printing Office as he may deem advisable, and to make some suitable and convenient arrangement for keeping them for sale, and the same shall be sold together or separately and at the cost of paper, press-work, and binding, and the proceeds of all sales shall be paid into the Treasury.

Section 4 declares that the revised statutes shall not be published by the authority or at the cost of the United States except as above provided.

Section 5 requires the Secretary of the Interior to cause all the copies of the revision of Indian treaties made by Thomas J. Durant and now printed, to be bound and deposited with the Interior Department for the use of the Department and officers of the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge to one point. The bill says that the statutes shall not be printed at the cost of the United States except in the manner provided by the act. Ought they to be printed at all otherwise? Ought there to be any erroneous editions of the statutes, and is there not danger that there will be if they are allowed to be printed? I make the suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator's question logically to go to this length, to be an inquiry whether we shall not in some way prevent any book-seller or book-maker who chooses from publishing the laws of this country.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what I mean precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it would be rather an extreme application of the doctrine of copyright to prevent a man publishing at his own expense the statute laws of the country, or any of them.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be an extreme stretch of the copyright law perhaps to prevent any man from publishing a correct copy of the statutes; but it seems to me it would be a very proper use of the copyright law to require that any person who did publish the statutes should subject them to some revision which should establish their authenticity. I can hardly conceive of anything that would be more dangerous than to have a cheap edition of the laws that men would buy because it was half-price, and act upon it and find errors.

Mr. CONKLING. Has there ever been any such edition of the laws as the Senator speaks of?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. I never heard of any.

Mr. CONKLING. Did we ever have any penal or other statute to prevent any man from publishing the laws if he chose?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the laws published by Little & Brown are copyrighted. I do not know how that is; the Senator probably does.

Mr. CONKLING. I know of no such thing, and I can hardly conceive how any man for the love of gain—and I know of nothing else to induce him to do so—should publish for sale as a law-book an incorrect, pretended, and vicious copy of the statutes of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not maliciously; I do not mean purposely.

Mr. CONKLING. But even heedlessly. How he could expect a somewhat exact profession, to which his sale must be limited, compelled to use these books as its tools, as a carpenter uses his chisel or his plane, to buy an edition of the statutes which whether maliciously or not, was incorrect and untrue in any particular, I cannot understand.

However, Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island has any doubt about it, I have no objection to this bill being printed and lying on the table. I do not think it is worth while to refer it; it may just as well be printed and lie on the table, and I will try if I can to-morrow during the day or at some time to secure action upon it. I will say that I have a note in my hand received from the chairman of the committee in the other House assigning reasons, which I shall not detain the Senate by stating, why there should be speedy action in this regard; and therefore although I consent that the bill be printed and lie on the table, I hope we shall not long delay it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I only called the Senator's attention to the point I spoke of. I ask the Senator to look into the point. The statutes at present are copyrighted, I find.

Mr. CONKLING. Perhaps this bill had better be printed and lie on the table, unless the Senator from Rhode Island feels satisfied about it. I do not wish to have it pushed through with undue haste.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am satisfied about it if the Senator from New York is. I merely called attention to the fact. The Senator tells me that the copyright of Little & Brown's edition applies to the marginal notes and references.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely, but copyrighted by whom?

Mr. ANTHONY. By Little & Brown.

Mr. CONKLING. By the persons who, as contractors, were permitted to print it. They have a motive for copyrighting it, because whoever prints it is a competitor of theirs and they wish to put up bars against competition. The Government has no such interest. On the contrary, the Government has heretofore paid for the publication of its own laws needlessly in many newspapers. This act strikes out that provision. I think if all men and all women who choose are allowed to print copies of the statutes and sell them to whoever will buy them, we suffer nothing in that regard. If we were Little & Brown making a book for sale and profit, of course we ought to copyright it and prevent any competitor encroaching on our title; but it seems to me we are not in any such attitude.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the lawyers are satisfied, I am.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us go on with the moiety bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is evident we cannot finish the bill this evening, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; let us go on longer.

Mr. BOREMAN. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to withdraw that motion until I can have a short executive session.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that it is now five o'clock and very hot, and unless there is something very pressing I hope we shall not close the doors for executive business.

Mr. BOREMAN. I think we ought to have a few moments. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and directed, out of any money not otherwise appropriated by law, to pay to whomsoever shall be satisfactorily shown to him to be the owner or owners, his or their heirs or assigns or legal representatives, of any land sold for direct taxes under the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1862, and of the acts amendatory thereof, without interest, the amount of the proceeds of sale of any such land for direct taxes due to the United States under such act, except lands sold in South Carolina at Army and Navy sales, on which only partial payments have been made, less all taxes, costs, and legal charges accrued by reason of the sale thereof by the tax commissioners of the United States under the said acts: Provided, That such owner or owners, their heirs or assigns or legal representatives, as the case may be, shall, before such payment, duly execute and deliver a full and complete quit-claim conveyance of said property, and a release of all mesne rents and profits thereof to the purchaser or purchasers thereof at said tax sale, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, as the Secretary may require.

That in case the ownership of said property prior to such tax sale is in dispute, or when there are conflicting interests in such ownership, or when such interests are so involved as to render it proper for a court of equity to adjust the several interests of parties in the said land, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, out of any money not otherwise appropriated by law, to a receiver, who may be appointed by a court having jurisdiction to determine and adjust the said interests of parties claiming an interest in said land, and who may be appointed by said court for such purpose, who shall give security for the performance of his duties as the court may require, the amount of the proceeds of said sale, without interest, less all taxes, costs, expenses, and charges, as aforesaid, to be distributed, according to the order of said court, upon principles of equity, among the parties interested in said land according to their respective interests: Provided, That an order or decree be made by such court, all parties in interest consenting thereto, that said sum of money shall be accepted in lieu of the land, and that a commissioner or other officer be appointed thereby, who shall execute a complete quit-claim conveyance of said property, and a release of all mesne rents and profits thereof, to the purchaser or purchasers thereof at said tax sale, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives; which conveyance shall, upon the receipt of such money by such receiver, operate as a complete extinguishment of all claim, right, title, and interest of the parties to such suit, who may have been the owner or owners of said land at and before such sale, or have derived title or interest therein from such owner or owners as heirs, assigns, or otherwise.

SEC. 3. That in case the owner or owners of the land at and prior to such tax sale, or parties having a valid lien or interest upon or in the same, or any one or more of such owners or parties, are incapacitated, by reason of infancy, insanity, or other legal disability, from complying with the provisions of the first two sections of this act, so as to give to the said purchaser or purchasers a conveyance of their interests in the said land, or in case such former owners or parties, or any one of them, shall refuse to avail themselves or himself of the privilege conferred by the said first two sections, and such facts shall be satisfactorily shown to the Secretary of the Treasury, and in case it shall also be shown to his satisfaction that the tax commissioners under the act, in executing the provisions of said act, made it their invariable rule and practice not to receive the taxes after the forfeiture imposed by the act and before the sale unless the same were tendered by the owner of said land in proper person. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, out of any money not otherwise appropriated by law, pay on their application and surrender of the tax-sale certificate to the purchaser or purchasers at said tax sale, his or their heirs, or assigns, or legal representatives, as he may determine, the amount of the proceeds of said tax sale less all taxes, costs, and charges under the said act: Provided, That said purchaser or purchasers, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, as the case may be, shall first execute and deliver to the former owner or owners, and their heirs or assigns, a quit-claim conveyance of said property; which conveyance shall take effect and give to the former owner or owners, their heirs or assigns, an immediate right of possession to said property upon the receipt of the said money by said purchaser or purchasers, or their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives.

SEC. 5. That the purchasers, their heirs or assigns, of lands in South Carolina, sold at what is known as "Army and Navy" sales, and which lands have reverted to the United States for non-payment of the full amount of purchase-money, may be permitted to redeem the same, as provided in section 5 of said act, on payment into the Treasury of the remainder of purchase-money, with interest, at the legal rate in South Carolina, from the date when said remainder of purchase-money became due, to the date of payment into the Treasury, deducting rents received by the United States from such lands, but rents in no case to offset principal. And such Army and Navy purchasers shall make said payment, with interest as aforesaid, into the Treasury of the United States within six months from the passage of this act, at which time their right to the redemption of said land shall cease.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 435) to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, be passed.

The bill, which was read, in its first section provides that the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries therein designated shall be authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name of the State of Colorado; which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever as therein provided.

The second section provides that the State of Colorado shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Commencing on the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude where the twenty-fifth meridian of longitude west from Washington crosses the same; thence north, on said meridian, to the forty-first parallel of north latitude; thence, along said parallel, west to the thirty-second meridian of longitude west from Washington; thence south, on said meridian, to the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude; thence, along said thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude, to the place of beginning.

The third section provides that all persons qualified by law to vote for representatives to the General Assembly of said Territory at the date of the passage of the act shall be qualified to be elected, and they are authorized to vote for and choose representatives to form a convention under such rules and regulations as the governor of said Territory, the chief justice, and the United States attorney thereof may prescribe; and also to vote upon the acceptance or rejection of such constitution as may be formed by said convention, under such rules and regulations as said convention may prescribe; and the aforesaid representatives to form the aforesaid convention shall be apportioned among the several counties in said Territory in proportion to the vote polled in each of said counties at the last general election as near as may be; and said apportionment shall be made for said Territory by the governor, United States district attorney, and chief justice thereof, or any two of them; and the governor of said Territory shall, by proclamation, order an election of the representatives aforesaid to be held throughout the Territory at such time as shall be fixed by the governor, chief justice, and the United States attorney, or any two of them, which proclamation shall be issued within ninety days from the passage of the act, and at least thirty days prior to the time of said election; and such election shall be conducted in the same manner as is prescribed by the laws of said Territory regulating elections therein for members of the house of representatives; and the number of members to said convention shall be the same as now constitutes both branches of the Legislature of the aforesaid Territory.

The fourth section provides that the members of the convention thus elected shall meet at the capital of the Territory, on a day to be fixed by the governor, chief justice, and United States attorney, not more than sixty days subsequent to the day of election, which time of meeting shall be contained in the aforesaid proclamation mentioned in the third section of the act, and, after organization, shall declare, on behalf of the people of said Territory, that they adopt the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be authorized to form a constitution and State government for said Territory; provided that the constitution shall be republican in form, and make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, except Indians not taxed, and not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence; and further provided that said convention shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State, first, that perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested, in person or property, on account of his or her mode of religious worship; secondly, that the people inhabiting said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States, and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States residing without the said State shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to residents thereof, and that no taxes shall be imposed by the State on lands or property therein belonging to or which may hereafter be purchased by the United States.

The fifth section provides that in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of said Territory of Colorado in compliance with the provisions of this act, said convention forming the same shall provide by ordinance for submitting said constitution to the people of said State for their ratification or rejection, at an election to be held at such time and at such places and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said convention, at which election the lawful voters of said new State shall vote directly for or against the proposed constitution; and the returns of said election shall be made to the acting governor of the Territory, who, with the chief justice and United States attorney of said Territory, or any two of them, shall canvass the same; and if a majority of legal votes shall be cast for said constitution in said proposed State, the said acting governor shall certify the same to the President of the United States, together with a copy of said constitution and ordinances; whereupon it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation declaring the State admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, without any further action whatever on the part of Congress.

The sixth section provides that until the next general census said State shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States, which Representative, together with the governor and State and other officers provided for in said constitution, shall be elected on a day subsequent to the adoption of the constitution and to be fixed by said constitutional convention; and until said State officers are elected and qualified under the provisions of the constitution the territoral officers shall continue to discharge the duties of their respective offices.

The seventh section provides that sections numbered 16 and 36 in every township, and where such sections have been sold or otherwise disposed of by any act of Congress other lands, equivalent thereto, in legal subdivisions of not more than one quarter-section and as contiguous as may be, are granted to said State for the support of common schools.

The eighth section provides that provided the State of Colorado shall be admitted into the Union in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act fifty entire sections of the unappropriated public lands within said State, to be selected and located by direction of the Legislature thereof, on or before the 1st day of January, 1878, shall be granted, in legal subdivisions of not less than one quarter-section, to said State for the purpose of erecting public buildings at the capital of said State for legislative and judicial purposes, in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe.

The ninth section provides that fifty other entire sections of land as aforesaid, to be selected and located as aforesaid, in legal subdivisions as aforesaid, shall be granted to said State for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for a penitentiary or State prison in the manner aforesaid.

The tenth section provides that seventy-two other sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university, to be selected in manner as aforesaid, and to be appropriated and applied as the Legislature of said State may prescribe, for the purpose named and for no other purpose.

The eleventh section provides that all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use, the said land to be selected by the governor of said State within two years after the admission of the State, and when so selected, to be used and disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature shall direct; provided that no salt spring or lands, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which hereafter shall be confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this act be granted to said State.

The twelfth section provides that 5 per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of public lands lying within said State, which have been or shall be sold by the United States prior or subsequent to the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to the said State for the purpose of making such internal improvements within said State as the Legislature thereof may direct.

The thirteenth section provides that the eighth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to appropriate the proceeds of the sales of the public lands and to grant pre-emption rights," approved the 4th day of September, 1841, shall be declared applicable to the State of Colorado when admitted into the Union as herein provided.

The fourteenth section provides that any balance of the appropriations for the legislative expenses of said Territory of Colorado remaining unexpended shall be applied to and used for defraying the expenses of said convention and for the payment of the members thereof, under the same rules and regulations and rates as are now provided by law for the payment of the territorial Legislature.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I ask the gentleman from Colorado whether he can tell the amount of lands appropriated by this bill, or the value of the salt springs granted to Colorado? The measure seems to contain a much larger appropriation than any other bill for the admission of a new State.

Mr. CHAFFEE. It is an exact copy of the bill passed the other day for the admission of New Mexico as a State into the Union, and makes no larger appropriation of public lands or salt springs. It is in the usual form of enabling acts.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for the purpose of moving an amendment.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I accept the amendment as part of my motion.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 4, line 27, after the word "lands" insert these words: "and to all lands owned or held by Indian tribes until the title thereto shall have been extinguished by the United States."

Mr. BECK. Are amendments in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado has accepted the amendment as part of his motion.

The question then recurred on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CHAFFEE and Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 110, noes not counted.

So the motion was seconded.

The question then recurred on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BECK demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 171, nays 66, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Berry, Bland, Bradley, Bright, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Roderick R. So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the bill passed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent that the following be added as an additional section to the bill just passed for the admission of Colorado as a State into the Union.

Mr. FORT. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The two sections of land in each township herein granted for the support of common schools shall be disposed of only at public sale, and at a price not less than $2.50 per acre, the proceeds to constitute a permanent school fund, the interest of which to be expended in the support of common schools.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. GUNCKEL. In accordance with the notice previously given I move that the rules be suspended, and that the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs for the bill (S. No. 14) in relation to bounties be passed.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be allowed and paid to each and every non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, and private soldier, including those borne upon the rolls as slaves, who faithfully served as such in the military service of the United States, who have been honorably discharged from such service, the sum of eight and one-third dollars a month for all the time which such non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, and private soldier actually so served between the 12th day of April, 1861, and the 9th day of May, 1865.

SEC. 2. That in case of the death, either before or after the passage of this act, of any such non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, or private soldier, the allowance and payment shall be made to his widow, if she has not remarried, or if there be no widow or she has remarried, then to the minor child or children of such deceased non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, or private soldier.

SEC. 3. That in computing and ascertaining the bounty to be paid to any non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, or private soldier, or to his proper representative, under the provisions of this act, there shall be deducted therefrom any and all bounties already paid under the provisions of any United States or State laws.

SEC. 4. That no bounty under the provisions of this act shall be paid to or on account of any soldier who served as a substitute in the Army, or who was a captured prisoner of war at the time of his enlistment, nor to any one who was discharged on his own application or request for other cause than disability incurred in the service prior to the 19th day of April, 1865, unless such discharge was obtained with a view to re-enlistment or to accept promotion in the military or naval service of the United States, or to be transferred from one branch of the military service to another, and such person did actually so re-enlist, or accept promotion, or was so transferred. And no bounty shall be paid to any soldier discharged on the application or at the request of parents, guardians, or other persons, or on the ground of minority.

SEC. 5. That every petition or application for bounty made under the provisions of this act shall disclose and state specifically, under oath and under the pains and penalties of perjury, what amount of bounty has been paid under the provisions of any United States or State laws to the non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, or private soldier by whom or by whose representative the claim is made.

SEC. 6. That the widow, if she has not remarried, or if there be no widow or she has remarried, the minor child or children, of any non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, or private soldier, whose enlistment was for a period less than one year, and who was killed or died while in the line of duty during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, or who shall have since died by reason of wounds received or disease contracted while in such service shall be entitled to receive the sum of $100.

SEC. 7. That in case the bounty due any person under this act shall amount to a sum not less than $100, it shall be at the option of such person to receive from the Government, through the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in lieu of such bounty, a warrant, not subject to assignment, receivable at any of the land offices of the United States, in full payment of one hundred and sixty acres of any of the public lands subject to entry by homestead or purchase; and for any lands located with said warrants patents shall be issued, without requiring proof of either residence or settlement.

SEC. 8. That any attorney or agent who shall receive from any claimant a sum greater than ten dollars for the prosecution of any claim under the provisions of this act, upon conviction thereof, shall pay a fine not to exceed $1,000, or imprisonment for a term not less than one year, or both, as the court or jury may adjudge, and shall forever thereafter be excluded from prosecuting claims of any nature whatsoever against the Government of the United States.

SEC. 9. That it shall not be lawful for any soldier to transfer, assign, barter, or sell his discharge, final statement, descriptive list, or other paper, for the purpose of transferring, assigning, bartering, or selling any interest in any bounty under the provisions of this act. And all such transfers, assignments, barters, or sales heretofore made are hereby declared null and void as to any rights intended to be so conveyed by any such soldier,

SEC. 10. That in any case where a person entitled to receive payment of bounty under the provisions of this act shall make application therefor, or where such application shall be made by the proper representative of such person being deceased, and the discharge of such person has been lost, it shall be competent for the accounting officers to receive, in lieu of the actual production of such discharge, proof of the actual loss of the same and secondary proof of its issue and contents, together with proof of the identity of the claimant or person deceased, under such rules defining the character and form of the evidence as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

SEC. 11. That no adjustment or payment of any claim of any non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, wagoner, or private soldier, or his proper representative, under the provisions of this act, shall be made, unless the application be filed within five years from the passage of the same.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is this bill debatable?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not debatable under a motion to suspend the rules and pass it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the House will not agree to vote away 200,000,000 acres without any debate.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Four hundred million acres.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I ask that my colleague [Mr. GUNCKEL] may have fifteen minutes to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is now within ten minutes of one o'clock, and at that hour the Committee on Elections is entitled to the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] allow me to offer an amendment to make the bill include non-commissioned officers and privates of the United States Marine Corps? If the bill is to pass, there is no reason why marines should not be provided for as well as those who are in this bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to suggest an amendment.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I do not admit any amendment. And I wish to say that this bill only calls for half as much as another bill which was passed unanimously by this House.

On the question of seconding the motion for the suspension of the rules tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILLARD of Vermont, and Mr. GUNCKEL were appointed.

The House divided and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 87.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That Wednesday, June 10, from one hour after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it shall be in order to consider all bills reported by said committee in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Subject to all points of order, of course.

The SPEAKER. This would not leave it so.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the bills should be left subject to all points of order.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. We desire that they shall be considered in the House, and not be subject to points of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope that order will not be made.

The question was taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, and there were—ayes 82, noes 71.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 108, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was on suspending the rules and adopting the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do not the public buildings and grounds come before the House in the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. They do. And I wish to have that bill considered to-morrow. I withdraw for the present the call for the yeas and nays, that the question may first be decided by a rising vote.

On a rising vote, there were ayes 87; not two-thirds of those present.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to modify the resolution so far as to except appropriation bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to any modification.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have been trying for a month to get up the Geneva award bill and I cannot.

The question was taken and there were—yeas 154, nays 84, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Roderick R. Williams, William B. Williams, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodworth—84.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Averill, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Benjamin F. Butler, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Darrall, DeWitt, Dobbins, Elliott, Farwell, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Hersey, George F. Roberts, Scofield, Shanks, Sherwood, Sprague, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Waddell, Waldron, Wheeler, Wilber, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Pierce M. B. Young—51.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the resolution was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NIBLACK said: My colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] has been called home by the dangerous illness of a member of his family, and may not be able to be present during the remainder of the session.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. PACKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to House bill No. 2709, to declare the bridge across the Niagara River a post-route; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same; and that it be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The hour has arrived at which the Committee on Elections are entitled under a suspension of the rules to the floor for the consideration of the Louisiana contested-election case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inquire if during that time a motion to suspend the rules will be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desired that statement of the Chair for the protection of those who have to be absent on committees of conference.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

Mr. KENDALL. I ask unanimous consent to the passage of the bill (S. No. 563) for the relief of John M. McPike, and I think if the House will hear me for three or four minutes they will pass it without objection.

The bill was read.

Mr. GARFIELD. That bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada asks consent to pass it now.

Mr. GARFIELD. No appropriation bill of that sort ought to pass without reference to a committee of the House.

Mr. KENDALL. I ask unanimous consent for a moment to explain the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill is now before the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KENDALL. This is a Senate bill. It was reported unanimously in the last Congress by the Senate Committee on Claims but failed for want of time. At the present session it has been reported in the same manner, unanimously, and the House Committee on Claims are prepared to report it unanimously.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is this the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] must proceed or surrender the floor.

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman from New York yielded the floor to me.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Vermont has a right to object. The regular order must be proceeded with if the demand for it is made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the gentleman from Vermont will not object to my offering a resolution in reference to the Washington monument.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not understand that any committee of the House has examined the bill which the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDLLL] desires to pass, and for that reason I ask the regular order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I believe the gentleman from Vermont does not make objection to the resolution which I desire to offer, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] is willing to yield to allow me to offer it. It is in reference to the Washington monument.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded it is the duty of the Chair to enforce it.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to call up the contested-election case from Louisiana of Sheridan vs. Pinchback.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I desire to know if the gentleman from Vermont really objects to my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin has no right to interrupt the business of the House in that way. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] has demanded the regular order and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] is willing to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. He has no right to do it if objection is made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have simply made an appeal to the gentleman from Vermont, and I would like his answer. I ask him if he is not willing to yield to me for the purpose of offering the resolution I have indicated?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I have asked for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient. The gentleman from New York must proceed with the election case or surrender the floor.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Now I have got an answer from the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER. It is the same answer he gave twice before.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I never knew him to yield for anything that was just.

LOUISIANA ELECTION CONTEST—SHERIDAN vs. PINCHBACK.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections in the case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback, from the State of Louisiana.

The Clerk read the resolutions reported by the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That the evidence in this case is not sufficient to establish the right of either P. B. S. Pinchback or George A. Sheridan to a seat in this House as a Representative at large from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That Mr. Sheridan have leave to amend his notice of contest, if he shall so elect, serving upon Mr. Pinchback his amended notice within twenty days hereafter; that Mr. Pinchback have liberty to answer such amended notice within forty days hereafter, and that, upon the service of such answer, the evidence of the respective parties be taken, under the existing laws of Congress in such case made and provided; and that in case of default of an answer to such amended notice, Mr. Sheridan be at liberty to take testimony ex parte; and in case of default to serve an amended notice of contest, Mr. Pinchback may serve a notice of contest, as provided by law, within forty days hereafter, and take testimony in like manner.

[Mr. SMITH, of New York, addressed the House in favor of the report of the majority of the committee. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION—SHERIDAN vs. PINCHBACK.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections in the Louisiana contested-election case of Sheridan vs. Pinchback.

Mr. SYPHER. Mr. Speaker, in approaching the question usually denominated the "Louisiana case," I confess it is with unaffected diffidence, and with sincere distrust of my ability to deal adequately with it. The matters involved in it are so supreme in their moment, so complex in their character, so far-reaching in their constitutional, political, and legal relations, that the ablest in the land might well hesitate at this threshold. This subject has already received the most exhaustive examination and elucidation from the foremost minds of the Republic. And yet, sir, sent as I am to represent, in part, the people of a State whose property, safety, liberty, lives, institutions, government, and very existence have been staked upon the results and issues of this conflict, I cannot—nay, I dare not—be silent. Distrusting, as I unfeignedly do, my ability either to adequately present the principles of public justice and of law upon which the republicans of Louisiana rely for their vindication, or to add to what others have said in this connection, I approach my duty and my theme with the unfaltering assurance that vindication is to come quickly, triumphantly, and complete. Made strong by the confidence of being for the right, and with the fixed purpose of having for my guide in this presentment nothing but the principles of recognized law and the truths of our recent history, I do not wholly despair that even my voice may contribute something to the establishment of the momentous cause for which I plead.

NO APOLOGIES.

I wish at the very outset to declare to this House and the country that I come not here in the character of an apologist or defender of those for whom I speak. I assume no attitudes of penitence for public wrongs nor of imploration for pardon in this high tribunal of the people's Representatives.

I do not say that we have nowhere erred, for that would be to say we are not human. I do not say that irregularities, and even illegalities, have nowhere occurred in our conduct of public affairs, for that would be to utter what can never be truly said of the purest administrations in times of serenest calmness. I do not say that resorts have not been had, in our resistance of revolution, to remedies most extraordinary, for that would be to confess that we had omitted to employ in the defense of our institutions the only remedies which governments provide for their defense when assailed, as ours were, by an organized, skilled, and vast conspiracy, unprecedented in its powers and purposes of wickedness, except by that which gave it birth—the slaveholders' rebellion.

No, Mr. Speaker; I come with no apologies from Judge Durell about usurped jurisdictions; no cravings for charity toward the judgments of the supreme court of Louisiana; no implorations for pardon because Federal bayonets crossed the pathway of assassins, red with the blood of human massacres, and freighted with a larceny of the ballots of a sovereign State. If the authors of that triumph which rescued Louisiana from a second attempt to overthrow free government are to be summoned here at your feet, either as criminals, suppliants, or apologists, they must come in the person of some other representative than me. I come to demand for them not hemlock, but laurel. The State of Louisiana is republican by more than 20,000 majority. This I will now proceed to demonstrate. First, I invite your attention to the classification of the population of that State found in the census report. The total number of males, white and black, aggregates 173,979, of which 158,793 are citizens, and of these 86,913 are colored. Therefore the voting population consists of 71,880 whites and 86,913 colored, or 15,033 colored majority. It is not denied that the colored electors invariably and almost without exception vote the republican ticket unless hindered by fraud and intimidation. It is also conceded that of the 71,880 white votes, at least 5,000 vote the republican ticket; therefore it is shown that the relative party strength stands 66,880 white democrats against 91,913 white and colored republicans, or 25,033 republican majority in the State. So much for the census. But more conclusive proof is found in the official vote of previous elections in that State.

The returns of the general election of April, 1868, show 65,000 votes for the republican and 38,000 votes for the democratic ticket, or 27,000 republican majority in the State. That election, let it be remembered, was held under Federal laws administered by a democratic executive, supervised and directed by a general of the Army whose well-known democratic proclivities and hostility to the reconstruction acts made him the fit instrument to execute the policy of Andrew Johnson, who sent him to Louisiana for that specific purpose. The results of that election will not be called in question by our opponents. The result of the presidential election in 1868 in my State I will not cite here. Our opponents are ashamed of it. It is the darkest page of the bloody record of that period. Election day was a funeral day, and the victims outnumbered the whole republican vote cast in the metropolis of the State.

Again, at the election of 1870, the republican ticket received 65,500 votes, and the democratic 41,000; or 24,500 republican majority. To overcome 25,000 republican majority by a party whose ranks were decimated by Greeley nausea, and its honest membership disgusted at the alliance formed with the "most infamous of all the adventurers," challenged the arts of the boldest conspirators; but the prize at stake was glittering—a seat in the United States Senate, and social recognition by the "oldest and best." To secure these the covenant was kept. The sovereign will of the people was reversed; as by magic 25,000 republican majority was changed to 10,000 democratic.

Statement showing the number of registered voters, white and colored, and the official vote returned by the democratic board of canvassers in 1872.

	Registration.		State vote.
	White.	Colored.	Democratic.	Republican.
In twenty-four parishes	52,322	51,291	36,367	34,990
In thirty-two parishes	35,350	43,416	29,221	20,383
	87,672	94,707	65,588	55,373

In the thirty-two parishes last mentioned a registry of 35,350 white electors produced a vote of 29,226; and by the same ratio a registry of 43,416 colored electors would produce a vote of 35,887. This shows a republican loss in these parishes of 15,500 votes. I commend this statement to the consideration of intelligent and unprejudiced men of all parties as a complete confirmation of the testimony of Mr. Blanchard, which I shall presently quote.

How this suppression of 15,000 was accomplished appears in part from the following, which is admitted in evidence in a case now pending before the Election Committee of this House:

It is admitted that there were no polls on the left bank of the Mississippi River above the court-house, say thirty-five miles distance from the upper line of the parish; that on the right bank there was no poll above Ronquillo settlement, a distance of forty-seven miles; and it is further admitted that the largest part of the republican or colored vote was in these parts of the parish.

It is further admitted that the bulk of the opposition vote was in the lower part of the parish at the election held on the 4th day of November, 1872, in parish of Plaquemine, for members of Congress.

EFFINGHAM LAWRENCE.
H. C. WARMOTH,
Of Counsel for Mr. Lawrence.

Here is an admission by H. C. Warmoth, "attorney," that 2,000 republican voters in a single parish are denied the right to vote by a fraud perpetrated by H. C. Warmoth, governor.

Another subdivision. Sixteen parishes in 1870 cast an aggregate democratic vote of 7,363. The same parishes in 1872 cast 7,101 votes, a democratic loss of 262 votes in democratic districts. The other parishes of the State, 36 in number, gave in 1870 30,600 republican majority, which in 1872 was reversed and a majority of 1,556 claimed for the democratic ticket, an astonishing democratic gain of 34,000 votes in republican districts. Thus Louisiana is made the only exception to the otherwise universal rule of increased republican majorities in every other State of the Union.

Take another example, still more striking, in illustration of the frauds perpetrated, and especially upon the colored electors. In seventeen parishes with a population, as shown by the census, of 67,570 whites and 145,220 colored, (a ratio of 1 to 5,) the vote would stand 13,514 white, 29,044 colored. In 1868 these parishes cast an aggregate vote of 11,516 democratic and 23,745 republican, or 12,229 republican majority. In 1870 the vote stood 9,462 democratic and 24,613 republican, or 15,151 republican majority.

In 1872 the same parishes, manipulated by Warmoth, returned a vote of 14,599 republican and 17,548 democratic, a democratic gain of more than 18,000 votes. He who can practice such legerdemain deserves the sobriquet of the "magician of the ballot-box," and has earned the distinction to be known forever hereafter as the "Tweed of the South." A machine capable of such results should be patented, with the right to use restricted to the patentee. It would supersede the necessity of ballot-boxes and elections, for only returns would be required, and these, produced by this machine process, seem to have entirely satisfied the numerous scribblers and demagogues who have written and spoken profusely upon the "Louisiana usurpation."

ORGANIZED CONSPIRACY AND CONSPIRATORS.

With this much of preface I go at once to the fundamental proposition of my argument.

That which a majority of the people of Louisiana, their government and the Government of the United States, encountered and defeated in the general election in that State on the 4th day of November, 1872, was an organized, unlawful conspiracy, rising in its progress to revolution; directed in its purposes to the overthrow of the rights and liberties of the colored race in Louisiana, and to the practical annulment of all constitutions and laws, Federal and State, made for their protection; a conspiracy planned with far-reaching, cruel, and consummate cunning, entered upon with fixed and unscrupulous purposes of success, and carried forward and nearly consummated with diabolical fiendishness. Being such a revolution, it was both right, lawful, and the highest duty of citizenship to meet and defeat it—to defeat it, if need be, by war. Every part of this proposition, with all its legal significations, I would, were it in my power, force upon the attention and fix in the apprehensions of this nation.

I repeat, what was met and defeated in Louisiana was in its inception a felonious conspiracy which in its progress became revolution—organized throughout a State, planned, entered upon, and nearly consummated by metropolitan police, and by confederate soldiers armed as militia; led by an unscrupulous executive, who rallied to his support the thugs and assassins of former bloody conflicts in that turbulent State. To defeat that organization and that revolutionary movement, avowedly and determinately bent on the overthrow of the rights and liberties of the colored race, I aver, as a proposition of constitutional, public, and statute law, it was not only lawful, but supreme duty, to employ every necessary available means, including force.

No one will even approach to a just realization of the thing "as a fact" which I have just asserted, nor its legal bearings and consequences, who fails to comprehend the common and fell purpose and spirit which organized, moved, and inspired these banded conspirators. Let me repeat, then, for the third time, that the spirit of this complot was one of universal, implacable, and deadly hostility to the political rights of the colored race, and of all forms of constitution and law citizenizing and defending that race; and the purpose of the conspiracy was not to carry an election merely, but practically to overthrow and render nugatory civil and political equality in Louisiana. And it was, therefore, as a treasonous revolution, a public mischief and peril, ascending in its legal elements and enormity far above and beyond the sphere of mere frauds in elections—a thing to be permitted to be enacted first and tried afterwards by a jury of the enactors in a contested-election case. But it was to be met and defeated when it reached its revolutionary enormity with the legal methods by which governments and laws deal with revolutions; and in so far as peaceful methods for the prevention of such an impending mischief as this came to be exist in the structure of our government, they are only those which are appropriate for the protection of a State as a State, or of communities as communities, and are not the methods provided for the defense of the individual rights of a citizen or of a voter.

HISTORY.

To show how fearfully true what I have stated is both as to the magnitude and the purposes of this public disorder, let me now appeal to some of the established facts of its bad history.

The reference to these facts is not made from choice, nor for purposes of partisanship or of crimination. Were there no other motives than these for their statement I would, as to them, be silent forever, and would cover them up in an eternal oblivion. But considerations no less momentous than the preservation of our institutions and of the liberties of the people demand that this affair should be thoroughly understood, and fortunately for me much of the bloody history of my State forms part of the records of this House, whose committees compiled it.

In attaining a full conception of the animus and "common purpose" of this conspiracy, it must be understood, to begin with, that its projectors and executors were in the main the same who were in Louisiana the baffled, defeated, but still implacable projectors of the slaveholders' rebellion; not the gallants oldier who fought in gray for a cause he believed to be righteous, but the political traitor that plunged the country into war and had not the courage to fight on either side. They were headed, it is true, by the governor of the State—their last ally, our first traitor. His advance guard were the brigands and thugs of our metropolis.

I will name only a few of the important events; sufficient to characterize the whole, including that one which I now consider, and its quick-coming sequel at the town of Colfax.

The bloody tragedy enacted on the 30th of July, 1866, at the Mechanics' Institute was investigated by order of this House, and its dreadful details are part of your records. That one was, like all acts of violence, purely political, and was directed against the loyal people of my State, whose only offense was an attempt to assemble for the purpose of considering amendments to their constitution. The authors of that tragedy acted in obedience to express orders and prearranged plans, issued by the same party, and in a large degree the same men whose transactions are now under consideration. What they executed in 1866 was a slaughter whose eminence in guilt puts to shame the butcheries of St. Bartholomew and Glencoe—events at which human nature stood aghast throughout the world, and which sent a shudder of inexpressible horror down through succeeding ages. An inadequate glimpse of this great political crime is found in the report of the Select Committee on New Orleans Riots, second session Thirty-ninth Congress. I quote from that report the following:

> There has been no occasion during our national history when a riot has occurred so destitute of justifiable cause, resulting in a massacre so inhuman and fiend-like, as that which took place at New Orleans on the 30th day of July, 1866. The massacre was begun and finished in midday; and such proofs of preparation were disclosed that we are constrained to say that an intention, existing somewhere to disperse and to slaughter the members of the convention, and those persons, white and black, who were present and were friendly to its purposes, was mercilessly carried into full effect. Six months have passed since the convention assembled when the massacre was perpetrated and more than two hundred men were slain and wounded. This was done by city officials and New Orleans citizens. But not one of these men has been punished, arrested, or complained of.

And in expiation of that crime not a stroke was inflicted upon the criminals, either by State or by national authority.

From that hour and out from that hall the actors, soaked and smeared with the blood of two hundred innocent victims, the dance of death went on, and ere the music of the massacre had expired in the air this Government, in April, 1868, made for the assassins and for their victims alike a new, free, and equal constitution, clothing them with all the powers of a State.

That clemency of the United States in sparing the authors of this wrong, and in restoring them to the Union, was quickly requited by a new political slaughter, which wrought out with satanic coolness and system, as shown by the records of this House, more than two thousand murders of the colored race. This work accomplished, it yielded quickly its coveted fruits in the reduction of the republican vote for President in that year of more than 30,000, and gave the State to the authors of this new and stupendous wrong, and had the election depended upon the vote of Louisiana would have given a President to this Republic. The results of terrorism in that political campaign are illustrated by these facts: Six parishes cast at the April election 5,453 republican votes; at the presidential election in November, not one.

The cause of that change is written in the blood of four hundred and fifty-nine victims, a sacrifice to democratic hate. Nine other parishes, which gave in April 16,864 republican votes, in November cast only 222. Again let the cause of that change be found in the slaughter and maiming of five hundred and forty-three innocents. The State which at the April election of 1868 gave 27,000 republican majority, at the presidential election in November of the same year was carried by the democrats by over 40,000 majority.

THE SECRET ALLIANCE.

I pass over that interval between 1868 and 1872, and on this occasion I leave unnamed the transactions of that fell organization known to your laws and public records as the clans of the Ku-Klux and K. W. C., which has written in the blood of this outraged race some of the saddest pages of human history; and which during these four years continued nearly ceaselessly their work of death. I come now to consider the revolution of 1872. Having failed to profit by violence and bloodshed in 1868, these same men entered upon their preparations for the presidential and State elections of 1872, by purchasing the alliance, offensive and defensive, of the governor of the State. Loving the treason while hating the traitor, the confederates arranged first that the thirty pieces of silver should be raised and paid; and, secondly, what should be the methods of the betrayal and crucifixion of the injured, patient, and suffering race of God's emancipated poor. The gentler forms which their treason assumed, and the more peaceful processes of its execution, in which by long-tried experience they had become marvelously expert, will be first considered.

ELECTION LAWS.

To a correct understanding of these methods a brief epitome of the election laws of Louisiana is necessary. The law vests in the governor the sole power of appointment and removal of all the election officers. These consist of one chief supervisor for the State, and one assistant for each parish, except Orleans and Jefferson, where there is one for each ward. All are under the immediate control of the chief. These officers are not required to be citizens of the parishes in which they act as election officers, men of bad character, and in many instances professional ballot-box manipulators, were sent from the city throughout the State. The duties of these officers are to make a complete registration of all the legal voters, appoint the judges of election at each poll, fix the number and place of the polls, count the votes, the boxes being conveyed to them at the county-seat for that purpose, and to make and forward to the governor a statement of the votes cast.

They are also required to report any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, or armed disturbance in their districts during the registration or election which tend to prevent a fair and free election, upon which the returning board have power to exclude the vote from their returns. The statements of votes and the reports of tumult, if any, are laid before the returning board by the governor, who, with four others designated in the law, comprise that board. They canvass and compile the returns in duplicate, file one copy in the office of the secretary of state, and of the other make public proclamation. The returns thus made and promulgated "shall be prima facie evidence of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected until set aside, after a contest according to law." It might be asked why such dangerous and extraordinary powers were conferred upon an executive?

ORIGIN AND PERVERSION OF THIS ACT.

Extremes beget extremes; the crimes of our opponents in the bloody fall campaign of 1868 furnished the reason for such legislation. Confiding in their governor, the republican legislature resolved that the massacres of that election should not be repeated if stringent laws could prevent it, and if repeated the conspirators should not profit by their crime. The dangerous and obnoxious features of this and other acts of our legislature, complained of and denounced, found their origin in the necessity of self-protection against the lawless violence and savage cruelty of a portion of our own community. In the election of 1870 this act was employed by an unscrupulous executive to return his henchmen to the Legislature from several strong republican districts. This was the first instance of the employment of that act for corrupt purposes; and in obedience to a popular demand the Legislature at its next session repealed it.

CONSIDERATION IN THE COMPACT.

The extraordinary power conferred on the governor by this election law was the only article of barter possessed by Governor Warmoth that the democracy longed for, and therefore the governor, loath to yield his power, all he now had left on which to make terms with his opponents, pocketed the repealing bill, together with the new election-law passed about the same time. (These laws can be found on pages 15 to 62 of Senate Report No. 457, third session Forty-second Congress.)

In this report the power of the executive is stated thus:

> The governor held in his own hands the entire machinery of the election; and he appointed the registrars and they appointed the commissioners of election, and the returns of the parishes were made to him.

TERMS OF THE BARGAIN.

Keeping, then, this in view, the power of the governor, we now turn to the inquiry, How was this power exercised in the conduct of the election we are now considering? I shall attempt no more than a statement of leading facts, but enough to characterize the whole. The facts I shall give are established by evidence overwhelming and conclusive. They are established in all their principal parts and in all the more revolting particulars by sworn testimony and official documents. The facts of the conspiracy are fixed in the history of my State by the sworn and uncontradicted statements of thousands of citizens of Louisiana, victims of the foul plot.

The first act in the drama of fraud was the league between the apostate governor, his retainers, and the democratic party. A full comprehension of this infamous league, in all of its wicked details, requires a brief review of the current political events.

The political parties in Louisiana as they crystallized after the "war of the factions," under Warmoth and Carter, were the national republican, last-ditch democracy, reformers, and liberal republicans. I have named them in the order of their numerical strength. The national republicans assembled in convention in June, 1872, and nominated their State and congressional tickets. The last-ditch democracy held their convention in April, in which a strong element developed itself in favor of Warmoth for governor. Thus early the old Slidell democrats, who knew so well the power of election machinery, held out the olive-branch to the despised carpet-bag governor, but the convention adjourned without making nominations. On the 5th of June, the last-ditch democracy and reformers assembled. The former nominated John McEnery, and the latter George Williamson, for governor.

Warmoth's friends had gained strength, but failed of a majority; so he secured the nomination for McEnery. Judge Head, the president of the convention, declared his opposition to this nomination "on account of the known proclivities of Colonel McEnery, expressed in and out of the convention, to coalesce with the State liberal-republican movement, headed by Governor Warmoth." Colonel McCranie, a delegate in the convention, and the candidate for Congress on the ticket with McEnery, declared in his paper, The Ouachita Telegraph, under the caption of "The unpublished history of the democratic convention:"

> Until the last day of the convention the chances alternated between the democrats in favor of not making further overtures to the Warmoth republicans and those who favored making further advances toward a Warmoth combination.

The New Orleans Times said:

We know that Colonel McEnery, both during and after the convention, did advocate such a liberal coalition, and received the nomination in compliment of his championship of such a policy.

Warmoth's friends in the convention had nominated their ticket, but they were unable to prevent the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That this convention is of opinion that Governor Warmoth is unworthy of the respect and confidence of the people, and that any political connection with him would be dishonorable and injurious to the best interests of Louisiana.

Early in July Colonel Williamson withdrew from the reform ticket, and the two tickets put in nomination coalesced and formed the "United States" ticket, with McEnery for governor.

The liberal republicans nominated their ticket in August, with D. B. Penn for governor. Upon which the New Orleans Picayune commented as follows: "Mr. Penn is the alter ego, the shadow, the cat's-paw, and tool of Governor Warmoth." A vigorous campaign had been inaugurated in the interest of the "United States" ticket and the public speakers and public prints were exhausting invective in denunciation of Governor Warmoth. But all of a sudden the committees appointed for that purpose reported that compromise and coalition had been agreed upon. The liberal-republican candidate for governor accepted the second place on the ticket with McEnery, and Warmoth was to be sent to the United States Senate as the reward of his apostacy and the price of his betrayal. Here are the "thirty pieces of silver:"

Resolved, That we recommend Warmoth for the support of the members of the liberal party who shall compose the next legislature, for the position of United States Senator.

PRESTO—CHANGE.

He sold himself for a mess of pottage, and then they stole the pottage. And that is the way the tail wagged the dog. Strange metamorphosis! straightway Warmoth the demon became Warmoth the angel, and the obnoxious election laws became the wisest upon the statute-books. Even the negro metropolitan police were suddenly bleached to Caucasian whiteness, in the hope that they would contribute to the consummation of the diabolical plot to defraud the people and to overthrow free government in Louisiana. And here is the ratification of this most foul conspiracy. The clans assembled, and the work so cunningly devised by the plotters in secret was approved and indorsed in public. Warmoth and McEnery—the dog and the tail—wag from the same platform. The bastard progeny of this clandestine alliance is christened fusion. At this ratification McEnery said:

In this fusion, in this compact, if I may so term it, I recognize as binding upon the whole people of Louisiana all the obligations which it imposes. * * * You must accept the compact, this coalition, as an absolute entirety. * * * There is to be no rejection of a part and the acceptance of a part; we must accept the whole or reject and repudiate the whole.

Governor Warmoth, in explanation of his course for not signing the new election law, for which the democrats had clamored so loudly, said:

The great mass of the people who had so long demanded the modification or repeal of these laws have entirely changed their minds.

Why this sudden change in the minds of "the great mass of the people," (democrats?) The answer is found in the Senate report, that document from which our opponents delight to quote, as follows:

That Warmoth's "control" of the election machinery was equivalent to twenty thousand votes, and we are satisfied by the testimony that this opinion was well founded.

WARMOTH AND M'ENERY.

Thus it was that these men adjusted the terms of their iniquitous "compact," and, as they fondly and firmly believed, made all its aims and purposes sure, and sealed it with the signet-ring of the Commonwealth worn by its apostate governor. But to insure success it was found that the recent amendments to the Federal Constitution must go down; that the bill of rights of the State of Louisiana must go down; that the laws securing freedom and purity in the election must go down; that the quiet, peace, and safety of the people must be disregarded in the execution of this projected revolution. The plan being consummated they began the work of their stupendous perfidy. Registration was denied to republican electors; fraudulent certificates were issued in the names of fictitious persons to democratic repeaters; the names of legally registered colored voters were erased from the lists; foreigners were fraudulently and illegally naturalized; duplicate certificates of registration were issued in the names of dead men to democratic repeaters; bogus ballot-boxes were substituted for genuine ones; ballot-boxes were stuffed; the polling places were located at unusual and obscure places without public notice; insufficient polls in many parishes; United States supervisors were debarred from remaining with the ballot-boxes to witness the count; misreading of ballots; forging of returns; rejection of republican parishes in the canvass unlawfully—all these things were done, as is now fully established by evidence and confessed by the parties who enacted them, in execution of an illegal and felonious conspiracy formed between Warmoth and his followers and the leaders of the democratic party.

We spied
Two serpents, rank'd abreast, the seas divide,
And smoothly sweep along the swelling tide.
Their flaming crests above the waves they show;
Their bellies seem to burn the seas below;
Their speckled tails advance to steer their course,
And on the sounding shore the flying billows force.
And now the strand, and now the plain they held;
Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were fill'd;
Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,
And lick'd their hissing jaws that sputter'd flame.

Such, dimly, was the performance on the part of the confederates of their set play up to the end of election day. It was a villainy employing as its actors the governor of the State, and nearly every election officer and other creature of his within the Commonwealth. Instead of an honest election it was a public atrocity, involving in its enactment the crimes of perjury, forgery, larceny, conspiracy, and a projected treason. It was aimed at the overthrow of the institutions of law, Federal and State, securing citizenship to a race.

THE PRIZES LOST.

But the end of election day was but the renewal of this diabolical scheme. When that day's work was done, these men were startled and confounded by the discovery of the fact that, notwithstanding all their infamous devices, their perjury, false registration, personations, repeatings, and other frauds, the State had gone largely republican. To admit this, would be instantaneous, irretrievable ruin to the conspirators. The principal actor in this nefarious alliance testifies, and it is in evidence in this case, as follows:

Deponent further says that he believes, and has reason to believe, and knows that the republican national and State tickets received a considerable majority of the votes actually cast at the election held on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872.

FALSIFYING THE VOTE.

When these facts burst upon them, uplifted by the spirit of atrocious daring, for the attainment of the much-coveted prizes, and impelled by the impending retribution which would follow swift and certain upon their overthrow, they rushed headlong, as fiends in despair, into deeper crimes and into more desperate undertakings.

They destroyed genuine ballot-boxes and substituted fraudulent ones, stuffed for the emergency. They directed their registrars and paid minions throughout the State, who had possession of the ballot-boxes, to exclude the United States supervisors from witnessing the count of the votes.

They excluded from their count the entire republican vote of the parishes of Iberville, Madison, Saint James, Saint Tammany, Saint Martin, Terre Bonne, Natchitoches, and Rapides—this upon the most fraudulent and shameless pretenses, but really and solely because they were republican.

Part of the prearrangement for an emergency such as that which arose on the night after the day of election was the promulgation of the following confidential order:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
OFFICE OF STATE REGISTER OF VOTERS,
New Orleans, October 24, 1872.

SIR: In addition to the instructions contained in Circular No. 8, from this office, you are instructed—

First. In counting the ballots after election, count first the votes cast for presidential electors and members of Congress, keeping separate tally-lists on the Form No. 1, provided for that purpose, and making up and completing the statement of votes for each poll, upon Form No. 1. Then close the box, reseal it, and proceed in a similar manner, until all the national votes have been counted.

Then proceed with the counting of the State and parish votes, bearing in mind the fact that the United States supervisors of election and deputy marshals have no right whatever to scrutinize, inspect, or be present at the counting of the State and parish votes.

All this was done in defiance of the plain provisions of the acts of Congress, providing that the supervisors should "be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election, and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes, and the making of a return thereof." And further, that such United States supervisors of election should "attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who being registered would be entitled to vote for Representatives in Congress, and at all times and places for holding elections for Representatives in Congress, and for counting the votes cast in said elections, and to challenge any name proposed to be registered, and any vote offered; and to be present at and witness throughout the counting of all votes, and to remain where the ballot-boxes are kept, at all times after the polls are open, until the votes are finally counted, * * * to affix their signatures, or his signature, to said register, for purposes of identification, and to attach thereto, or to the certificate of the number of votes cast, and any statement touching the truth or fairness thereof, which they or he may ask to attach."

The statute made it a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment not less than a year, for any one to hinder, prevent, or molest any such United States supervisor of elections in the discharge of these important duties. (See 16 United States Statutes at Large, 256.) All this accomplished was not enough wholly to stifle and reverse the voice of 20,000 majority of the republicans of Louisiana. The ugly fact remained, which is stated in the concluding words of the testimony cited, namely, that—

The republican national and State tickets received a considerable majority of the votes actually cast at the election held on the fourth day of November, A. D. 1872, in the State of Louisiana.

THE RETURNING BOARD.

This gigantic scheme of fraud having failed at the ballot-box, the last chance remaining to the conspirators was in the board of canvassers which made the final returns of the election. This returning board being hostile to the felonious purposes of the conspirators, must be reconstructed.

The Louisiana statute (section 54) provides as follows: "That the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, and John Lynch and T. C. Anderson, or a majority of them, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers." And the same statute (section 57) provides: "That should any of the returning officers named in this act be a candidate for any office at any election, he shall be disqualified to act as returning officer for that election, and a majority of the remaining returning officers shall summon some respectable citizen to act as returning officer in place of the one so disqualified." At this election Pinchback, the lieutenant-governor, and Anderson were candidates, and therefore ineligible. "The remaining" members of the board were Warmoth, Lynch, and Herron, whose duty it was to fill the two vacancies. Lynch and Herron (a majority of the quorum) being against Warmoth, in order to make the consummation of the conspiracy possible, one of them must be supplanted by a pliant tool, who, together with the governor, would fill the vacancies with two of the conspirators.

WARMOTH'S USURPATION.

Herron, whom Warmoth himself had appointed, and whom the court had, in a judgment final and unreversed, adjudged to be competent as de facto secretary of state, to act as member of the returning-board in filling vacancies therein and making canvass, was by the order of Warmoth forcibly ejected from his office by the police, and Jack Wharton, by like violence, was substituted as secretary of state and member of the returning board.

Warmoth and Wharton, assuming to act as members, selected two persons to fill the vacancies. Lynch and Herron acting together, selected two other persons to fill the vacancies. Thus two returning boards were constituted, each claiming to be the legal body.

But another difficulty presented itself. An honest, fearless judge refused to do the bidding of the conspirators, but issued an order restraining the Warmoth board from proceeding with the canvass. By an act of usurpation which would have cost a king of England his crown, if not his head, Warmoth, with police and thugs, ejected Judge Dibble from the bench by violence and installed Judge Elmore, in treasonous disregard of law.

Elmore, obeying the commands of his master, refused to execute the mandate of the supreme court of the State, reinstating Bovee as secretary of state, who had been unlawfully ejected by Warmoth in 1871. For this contempt the supreme court ordered Elmore to be fined and imprisoned. Warmoth instantly remitted the fine and imprisonment, and by force kept his man Elmore on the bench, who, proceeding further to execute his master's orders, dissolved the injunction granted by Dibble restraining the canvass by the Warmoth board.

Thus by usurpations involving in their train the nullification of the mandates of the supreme court—a court admitted even by Warmoth and his confederates to be the supreme and rightful judiciary of the State—involving the displacement by violence of the rightful secretary of state—involving by like violence the deposing of the rightful judge of the eighth district, and the substitution of a co-conspirator clothed in the judicial ermine—involving thus the overthrow of the constitution and laws, and the commission of the crimes of perjury, conspiracy, and actual treason, Warmoth ordered the canvass of the vote of the State to go on for the purpose of seating in power the conspirators and authors of the revolution.

Such, Mr. Speaker, at this juncture, was the condition of my treason-blasted and helpless State! Even the Senate committee, whose report is so false in its conclusions as to most of the wrongs inflicted upon Louisiana by the conspirators, is compelled to describe her condition in the following words, which I quote. I wish to impress upon the memories of my countrymen these words, extorted by the evidence before him, from the distinguished author of that report. They must never be forgotten by those who, either as lawyers, statesmen, or citizens, incline to be just, and who desire to reach just conclusions as to the legal rights and remedies to which we were entitled to resort for the rescue of a great State.

GRAND LARCENY OF ELECTION-RETURNS.

After Warmoth's attempt to reconstruct a returning board that would execute his fraudulent scheme had been frustrated and defeated, then, in defiance of law and of the express mandates of the courts, they stole from the archives of the State, where the law had deposited them, the returns of the election of the entire State, and upon which the law based, primarily, the determination of the election of every officer of the State and of the Representatives in Congress. They did this to the end that they might conceal the evidences of their crimes in the wholesale mutilation, suppression, forgery, and falsification of the election-returns of the entire State; that they might render impossible the best methods of determining the result of the election, might deprive the State of its duly-elected officers, and either force upon the people as their rulers the authors of this conspiracy, or else plunge the State into anarchy, bloodshed, revolution, and disaster.

ANARCHY.

Such, Mr. Speaker, at the date when this conspiracy had done its work, and when she asked and received succor from the national Government, was the condition of Louisiana. Let us contemplate for a moment the phenomenon which is now before us. More than ten thousand legal voters denied the exercise of the highest right of citizenship; the returns of the election of an entire State feloniously conveyed beyond the limits of the commonwealth; the decrees of courts, both State and Federal, set at defiance; judges and other constitutional State officers removed as by an imperial ukase; the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, dissolved in a consuming revolution, rendering anarchy imminent and inevitable, and the executive of the State the foremost traitor, riding upon the tempest as its ruling demon, rioting in heedless recklessness of the rights of the people and the stability of human society. In the midst of this impending ruin organized bands of conspirators, red and reeking with the blood of former massacres, breathing out threatenings and slaughter, paraded the streets of New Orleans, armed with knives and guns, ready and waiting for the signal to begin the havoc.

Mr. Speaker, such, without painting, is the picture presented by my State when the courts of this Union assumed to check the impending mischief and snatch her from the brink of irretrievable disaster. Such it was on the 9th of December, 1872, when her authorities, according to the constitutional forms provided, implored the national authorities for protection against domestic violence.

INCANTATIONS OF THE WITCHES.

Do you call such a disturbance of public peace, such a combination for fraud, such an organization for revolution, such a conspiracy for treason a "contested-election case," triable by a jury summoned by the leading conspirators themselves, and from the body of the revolutionists? I spurn the suggestion; I repel the proposition, and scorn with unutterable contempt the inventor, the promulgator, and the champion of the base conception—be it in senate-chamber or court-chamber—whoever comes into the presence of such an enormity with such a pusillanimous apology. A State sinks in the very throes of dissolution, a race of men goes down before an all-consuming mischief, while grave statesmen, with snatches of law read from Coke upon Littleton, or with quotations from the "intrusion act," like the witches in Macbeth in mumbling incantation, dance about the seething caldron to the amusement of the ghastly fiends who hope to fatten and prosper on their hell-broth.

O, well done! I commend your pains;
And every one shall share i' the gains.

Sir, the thing upon us was war—incipient, 'tis true, and not yet fully flagrant—still, adjusted, impending war. With bowed and uncovered head, here in this august presence, I thank Almighty God and bless this great nation that treason was met by that one, sole, adequate, lawful means by which it could be met—war!

THE REMEDY.

Sir, I cite no dog-eared law-books here. War is the God-enacted and the government-enacted remedy for war. The sword is the antidote set down in the law-books of nations as the lawful cure for revolutions. Salus populi suprema lex is the code complete, ordained from Heaven and of all men, provided for rescues such as came to Louisiana in the memorable words of the President of the United States, by the mouth of his law Secretary:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, let it be granted for the moment that the Lynch board was no board; that the votes actually cast elected no republican. Granting this as true, then assume what is fully and completely confessed by him whom the authors of this great enormity now put forward as their champion, and who speaks for them to-day in forums which, under the rules of the House, I may not here name, is also true. He says McEnery was not elected. "Governor Warmoth was in possession of the State;" "he owned the legislature;" "he had laws passed in blank which he could approve at pleasure;" "he carried the courts in his pocket;" "he was the State;" "he organized the election, and by fraud reversed the will of the people." (CARPENTER'S speech.)

Now look at this. A great people without a Legislature elected, without any of the great officers of State elected; with a governor constituting himself the State—courts in his pocket, laws passed in blank at his bidding by a Legislature owned by him—he organized a fraud called an election, which, by means of usurpation, forgery, perjury, conspiracy, larceny, and treason, reversed the will of an entire people. And this State, pregnant with armies of trained, armed, organized, and maddened conspirators parading the streets of the capital city and patrolling all the avenues of the State, awaiting only from their chief the signal for a general slaughter of the unarmed citizens. This, our enemies being judges, was the appalling condition of Louisiana in December, 1872.

In the presence of such a disorder as that, the authors of it come to us to-day, by their spokesmen in the Senate and in the House, and mock us with bad dialectics, worse logic, and execrable law; about its not being lawful, under the laws of Congress of 1795 and 1807, for the President to employ the Army to deliver an entire people from destruction by "domestic violence," and its being quite lawful under these laws to deliver that abstraction called their "State government" from "insurrection;" about the word "insurrection" appearing but once, and that in the wrong line, in the call of the governor of Louisiana for succor by the United States, under the guarantee clause of the Constitution, being reason enough in law why a State should be overthrown or its people disfranchised.

A QUESTION OF GRAMMAR.

Mr. Speaker, imagine that most pitiable spectacle of the officious and superserviceable pettifogger standing in the very presence and jaws of a seething revolution, which is devouring not only the people and institutions of a State, but a whole race of men, women, and children, discussing a question of grammar and descanting on rules of English composition before the President of the Republic, sworn to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, insisting that the State should go down and all the people perish rather than submit that the word "insurrection" be improperly or insufficiently employed in the governor's call for help.

Sir, the world laughed and wept by turns when it witnessed the President, in 1861, reading the riot act to the slave-holders' rebellion and bid it go home within twenty days; when they heard him call for seventy-five thousand men to put it down; when they listened to his Secretary prophesying about its all being over in ninety days.

That weakness was pardonable then, for then a thousand battle-fields, a million slain, a continent devastated, and a mighty people clothed in the habiliments of mourning and death had not yet taught us the profundity of meaning there is implied in the word "war." In the same manner and with the same intent, these men of Louisiana gathered in the array of war to exterminate a race or overthrow laws and governments defending them. But, sir, I thought fondly that we had learned at last this lesson, and that the era had passed for singing psalms to pirates and putting down revolts by the tactics of the dialectician.

AUTHORITY OF THE PRESIDENT.

Had the President on the 3d of December, 1872, no other authority than that under which Mr. Lincoln acted in 1861, when Grant said "Emery will furnish you with the necessary troops," his act would have been vindicated by every august precedent of our recent conflict, from the firing of the first gun to the surrender at Appomattox.

Grant would have been vindicated because, as in 1861, there were no executives or Legislatures who would apply, or who would have proper regard for the use of the word "insurrection," proclamations, and calls. So, also, there were none in Louisiana who could act on the 3d of December, 1872. In Virginia, in 1861, there was revolt, organized, banded, and ready for war. So there was in Louisiana, in 1872, in the metropolitan police, in the banditti of the city, in the organizations of secret orders, and in their headship, the governor, avowing his ability and determination to sweep the United States and other forces from the State in the establishment of his revolutionary government.

In 1861 the revolt meant the destruction of the constitution and the permanent enslavement of a race. It meant in Louisiana, in 1872, the disfranchisement of a race, and the defiance of all law made for their protection. In 1861 the loyal people stood appalled, and imploring the protection of the constituted authorities against insurrection and domestic violence. So did the people of Louisiana in 1872.

In 1861 the loyal people of the South had done no wrong nor forfeited any right to their Government's succor. So had not the people of Louisiana in 1872, who asked for it.

LEGAL JUGGLERY.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet alluded to what confounds me most of all in this display of legal jugglery, and this hunting, by employment of legal microscopes of uncertain magnifying power, for the line which distinguishes the meaning of the word "insurrection" from the meaning of the phrase "domestic violence."

These lawyers and statesman who are so capable of managing revolutions by citations from bad law and reckless statements, and of guiding the President, by these means, in his high and awful duty to put the revolution down, have throughout their arraignment of the President and the people of Louisiana ignored and left wholly unnamed the very act of Congress adapted to and made for the identical disorder which we encountered in my State. This act, which they leave unnamed, covers and sanctions every act of the President in this matter. I leave his assailants to tell the country why they have left unmentioned the very act of Congress which not only covers and protects, under the impenetrable panoply of the law, but expressly commands the doing of these acts as sworn official duty. The act commands their doing, whether the executive or the Legislature of the State should call for help or not; commands their doing whether Lynch's board or the other be the legal board; commands their doing whether McEnery be elected or Kellogg be elected; commands their doing in every and any event consistent with the confessed and undisputed facts of the overt treason which the President's acts met and defeated.

THE ENFORCEMENT ACT.

The act to which I allude was by its title "An act to enforce the provision of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes."

Whether it would have been constitutional to provide for the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States for the suppression of the public disorders described in the third section of this act, in the absence of an application by the Legislature or an executive of the State, prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, I need not inquire. By the provisions of the fourteenth amendment it is expressly provided that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the fourteenth amendment, among which are those securing the equal privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and prohibiting the States from denying to any person within their jurisdiction the "equal protection of the laws." Under this provision of the fourteenth amendment Congress is made the sole judge of what is appropriate legislation for securing to the citizens of the States that equal protection of the laws and their enjoyment of the fundamental rights of their national citizenship.

In exercise of the powers conferred and the duties imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, the act of 20th of April, 1871, was passed. The second section of this act provides that if two or more persons within any State shall conspire together to deprive any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the laws, or of equal privileges or immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State from giving or securing to all persons within such State the equal protection of the laws, or by force or intimidation to prevent them from giving support or advocacy in favor of the election of President or Vice-President, or members of Congress, they shall be deemed guilty of a high crime.

The third section of this act authorizes and commands the President to extend to the people of Louisiana the protection which they received from the United States in their hour of peril, in 1872. I state it in full, as follows:

SEC. 3. In all cases where insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations or conspiracies in any State shall so obstruct or hinder the execution of the laws thereof, and of the United States, as to deprive any portion or class of the people of such State of any of the rights, privileges, immunities, or protection, named in the Constitution and secured by this act, and the constituted authorities of such State shall either be unable to protect, or shall, from any cause, fail in or refuse protection of the people in such rights, such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States, and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination or conspiracy shall oppose or obstruct the laws of the United States, or the due execution thereof, or impede or obstruct the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia, or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations; and any person who shall be arrested under the provisions of this and the preceding section shall be delivered to the marshal of the proper district, to be dealt with according to law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, note the completeness of this act as the remedy for the very disorder in which Louisiana was involved in 1872, and note also how peremptorily the duty is which it imposes upon the President to extend to that people the succor which was so benignly sent. Note that the state of public disorder covered by this act is every one in which either "insurrection, domestic violence, unlawful combinations or conspiracies" exist in any State which produce certain described results. Neither all nor any two, but only one condition of the four named is required to be present.

What I have described as the condition of Louisiana is surely enough to warrant me in affirming that when the President intervened, all four conditions of disorder named in the act were present in the State in appalling magnitudes. I remind you here, requoting the words of him whom the conspirators have made the champion of their defense, that the frauds of the conspirators "completely reversed the will of the people." "Governor Warmoth was in possession of the State." "I mean all that the words imply." "He owned the Legislature." "He had laws passed in blank which he could approve at pleasure." "He carried the courts in his pocket." "He was the State."

A DISGRACEFUL PICTURE.

Mr. Speaker, even this picture, drawn by their own apologist of the wreck and havoc these conspirators had wrought, would be incomplete were not the colors added which the scenes I have described above give to the sad picture. That picture does not show, what the truth of history discloses, that the state of public mischief which it portrays was the sequence of an unlawful conspiracy between the leaders of the fusionists to "completely reverse the will of the people" by the overthrow of the right of the elective franchise on the part of the colored race. It does not show, what history will, that Warmoth repeatedly avowed his ability and determination, by the employment of his metropolitan police, his militia, his bands of thugs and roughs, to sweep from the field the troops of the United States and every other obstruction to the consummation of his conspiracy.

It does not show what history will show, that Warmoth tendered to the lieutenant-governor of the State, at the very date when the Legislature applied to the United States for rescue from domestic violence, a bribe of $50,000, or thereabout, if the lieutenant-governor would organize the senate in a manner subservient to the wishes of Warmoth.

The picture fails to show what history will, that at the beginning of this conspiracy the leaders in it with cool deliberation sat down and made mathematical computations of the number of colored voters in each parish which must be stricken from the registration books, in order "completely to reverse the will of the people."

It does not show how by actual violence the conspirators did eject from their high offices judges, secretaries, officers of registration, and other lawful ministers of the State, who refused to do their treasonous bidding, and by the same violence seated in their stead the willing instruments of their violence.

Now, add these colors to that picture of disaster in Louisiana, which I have brought hither from the halls of the senate, and then add to these colors this one also, that when these affairs were being transacted we were on the brink of revolution and bloodshed, courts powerless, judges fugitives, laws trampled under foot, the Legislature unorganized and unorganizable, property of the city ready for the torch, the people appalled, and a universal chaos of our institutions impending and imminent. Such, sir, was our case.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

In the name of truth and law, I implore this House and the country to answer me: Was not this case more than "insurrection," than "domestic violence," than "unlawful combinations," than "conspiracy?" Was it not war?

Was it not a violence which so obstructed the execution of the laws as to deprive a portion or class of the people of their privileges and immunities under the Constitution?

Our enemies being judges, they confess it was. More than this, for they confess that "Warmoth was the State," with courts, Legislature, and laws in his pocket; with the voice of the people completely reversed, and their institutions, judges, and rulers under his feet.

Did not the conspiracy direct its war to the overthrow of a "class"—the colored race, and as a class—and of the enactments both of Louisiana and of the nation made for the securement of their equality before the law? That it did, is shown in the fearful history of that rebellion which begat this one; by the massacres of July, 1866, of 1868, and of 1873 at Colfax; by the oaths of over four thousand of this injured race, now on file in the courts of the United States in Louisiana; by the testimony now before this House, and by the confessions of those who did it.

Were the authorities of the State "unable" or unwilling, or did they "from any cause fail" to protect these people in their privileges as citizens? The answer is again furnished by our enemy, who declares, "Warmoth was the State." "The courts were in his pocket." "The voice of the people was completely reversed." And this Warmoth was "FIRST CONSPIRATOR."

IMPLORING DELIVERANCE.

Now look, I entreat you—lovers of your country, and of its sublimely grand, free, and equal Constitution and laws—just made so by a most sacred and copious libation, by an expenditure of treasure, by a prodigy of patience, endurance, and courage, by a common national anguish, such as nation never gave before for their liberties and their equality under the law. Look at the spectacle I put before you. Such was the condition of the State, of the race for whom I plead so poorly to-day at your bar. In that case, so appalling, so prodigious in its elements of helplessness, disaster, and wreck, Louisiana reached out to the Union which had just rescued her once her manacled arms for another deliverance from the same implacable foe.

At the head of that Union was the soldier—the hero who had led her armies in the first and recent deliverance. This soldier had added now to his arm as commander the high powers and duties of First Magistrate, and to his military oaths he had added the still more solemn oaths of the Constitution, which bind the President—swearing that, to the best of his ability, he would preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, and take care that its laws were executed. Then, along with this appeal from Louisiana for help came the precepts of the law which I have read—plain, solemn, and commanding—that it shall be the President's duty "to suppress such insurrection," "domestic violence," "combination," or "conspiracy," and, mark it, this with or without an application from the executive or Legislature.

Sir, I declare that had the President not delivered us, so far as human eye can see Louisiana would then have passed into an abyss of ruin unfathomable; and the President's omission of duty would have covered his name with ineffable shame.

DUTY AND POWER OF THE PRESIDENT.

Still another duty is imposed upon the President by the requirements of this act of Congress of April 20, 1871. That duty was to decide, on conscience and under official oath, which of the two contending parties in Louisiana was the "constituted authority of the State" and which the party in insurrection. Fortunately for us the commanding authority of the Supreme Court of the United States gives light on that point in the case of Luther vs. Borden, (7 Howard, 43,) which says the President must of "necessity decide which is the lawful government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress. The statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts" on which he must decide this momentous question, and his decision remains the law, binding upon all departments of the Government and upon the people and authorities of the insurrectionary State until Congress shall overrule it. "If the President in exercising this power shall fall into error, or invade the rights of the people of a State, Congress would undoubtedly have the power to apply the proper remedy."

Here, I affirm, is the solution, so far as the action of the United States is concerned, of the law of the Louisiana case. Her calamities had arisen to such a magnitude that it is not merely trifling, but a shameless mockery, to say that it was merely a contested-election case.

CONCLUSIVE PROOF.

Sir, as I began, so I conclude: It was revolt, revolution, insurrection, domestic violence, conspiracy, and war, sweeping in its menace and magnitude far outside of judicial remedies. The only remedy was force; and, sir, I thank Heaven and the wisdom of the people that our laws were not left without remedy for this very peril, which was so met and defeated by the wise forecast of the Constitution and laws.

I add yet another legal consequence of the premises established. It is, that in absence of action by Congress, the government which the President has decided to maintain, and has maintained in the State, becomes the legal government thereof—legislative, executive, and judicial—until a new one is created and established by the people of Louisiana under their own constitution and laws. This beyond all question is not only the law of Martin vs. Mott, (12 Wheaton,) of Luther vs. Borden, (7 Howard,) but is the law also of the guarantee clause of the Constitution, and of that changeless maxim that "the safety of the people is the supreme law." It is, moreover, the inexorable law of that necessity which leaves no other way of preserving an imperiled State of this Union than by securing to it that peace and protection against "domestic violence" which can be given alone by the power and the Government of all the people.

The peace being thus preserved, their laws preserved, their freedom of choice preserved, then the consummation and completion of the grand designs and remedies of the Constitution come to the people of the rescued Commonwealth when the next election for the State shall come, and the people's free choice of their own rulers shall have corrected any faults of the President's decision between the contending parties, and they shall have freely created for themselves "a government of the people, by the people, for the people."

The present State government of Louisiana is, in every sense, the rightful, legal, and constitutional government of the State. Lawfully elected; lawfully ascertained to be elected; lawfully adjudged to be elected by the supreme court of Louisiana, as high and pure a tribunal as exists in any State in this Republic.

It was legally elected, notwithstanding a most foul conspiracy and the unparalleled frauds in the registration and the election. It is established by uncontradicted evidence—

That the republican national and State tickets received a considerable majority of the votes actually cast at the election held on the 4th of November, 1872, in the State of Louisiana.

The canvassing board which ascertained and promulgated the result of this election has been adjudged to be the legal board in fifteen or more final judgments by the supreme court of the State, the legality and constitutional power of which are universally recognized.

The larceny by the conspirators of the election returns of a State and their destruction or removal from the Commonwealth, rendering their canvass impossible, does not make it unlawful for the people thus defrauded to lay before the loyal board the best evidence which the conspirators have left them, and from which to determine the vote of the State and declare elected their chosen rulers. That resort of the people of Louisiana to secondary evidence was not only legal, but prevented the consummation of a treasonous revolution.

The result of that election having been thus determined and the result adjudged legal by the highest tribunal in the State of Louisiana, her government is the rightful and legal one, resting upon the choice of the people and upon principles of law uncontroverted since the era of the foundations of the common law and the establishment of civil government for its administration.

The present State government of Louisiana is recognized by the authorities of the United States and the civilized world; it is supported by the whole people of that Commonwealth; it is as impregnable and permanent as the local government in any State of this Union. Governor Kellogg's administration is the ablest, wisest, and purest which has existed in that State for a quarter of a century. To assail it or overthrow it by congressional interference would be as unconstitutional and indefensible as it would be needless and reckless.

Mr. LAMAR obtained the floor.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION—PINCHBACK VS. SHERIDAN.

[Mr. LAMAR addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RICE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I propose to call the previous question after the contestant, Mr. Sheridan, shall have occupied an hour. But I am willing to make the motion to adjourn if the House is not disposed to go on this evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us go on now.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I will make the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Other business will probably suffer to-morrow unless the previous question is seconded now. The understanding was that four hours would be devoted to this discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from New York will allow me I will make a motion that the House now take a recess, and that there be a session this evening for no other business than this.

The SPEAKER. The Hall will be otherwise occupied.

Mr. GARFIELD. The caucus can be held in another hall.

Mr. RICE. I insist on my motion that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent indefinite leave of absence was given to Mr. HOLMAN, on account of severe illness in his family; to Mr. WILBER for eight days; and to Mr. ROBBINS until Monday, the 15th instant.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3575) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands in certain portions of the States of Minnesota and Iowa;

An act (H. R. No. 3005) for the relief of Mary B. Redfield, of Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 2866) relieving the political disabilities of Fitzhugh Lee; and

An act (H. R. No. 2019) to forfeit certain public lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, in the State of California.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the same committee, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 860) granting one condemned cannon to Prescott Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, for the erection of a monument at Providence, Rhode Island;

An act (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward H. Calvert;

An act (S. No. 465) for the relief of Joseph Council, of Mobile, Alabama;

An act (S. No. 419) for the relief of Sebastian Reichert; and

An act (S. No. 384) for the benefit of the Louisville and Bardstown Turnpike Company.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will not adjourn, but will sit out this case and finish it now.

The question being taken on the motion that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 51, noes 71.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Elections in regard to the Louisiana contested-election case.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask that the contestant, General Sheridan, be now permitted to address the House.

Mr. RUSK. How long?

The SPEAKER. When contestants address the House, they speak under precisely the same rules as are applicable to members.

[Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Pinchback, contestants, addressed the House. (See Appendix.)

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I propose now to call the previous question and I have agreed that after the main question is ordered I will yield five minutes to Mr. Sheridan to reply to what has been said by Mr Pinchback. If the House will hear him for five minutes there will be no further debate on this question.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does the gentleman intend to ask a vote to-night?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I have arranged with my colleague on the committee from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] that no vote shall be taken to-night; but I think we had better order the main question with the understanding that the vote shall be taken to-morrow without further debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CESSNA in the chair.) Does the gentleman from New York desire to yield to the contestant from Louisiana before the previous question is seconded?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman yielding?

Mr. SMART and others objected.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Then I move the previous question.

Mr. DARRALL. Before the previous question is seconded I desire to offer the following resolution as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the minority of the committee:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback is entitled prima facie to a seat in this House as a member at large from the State of Louisiana, without prejudice to the claim of George A. Sheridan, contestant for said seat.

Mr. LAMAR. Is it understood that there is to be no vote on these resolutions to-night?

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I shall insist that the House shall stand by the arrangement I made with my colleague on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question can be settled presently.

Mr. LAMAR. A number of gentlemen have left the House on the faith of that agreement.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to have it understood that this condition be made: that the debate is ended and that there is to be no speaking to-morrow.

Mr. LAMAR. There will be no debate to-morrow.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Now, if the House will listen for five minutes to Mr. Sheridan, there will be no more debate.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and the motion was not ageed to, there being on a division ayes 25, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor to close debate.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I yield five minutes to the contestant, Mr. Sheridan.

Mr. SHERIDAN. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire in the five minutes allotted me by the kindness of the chairman of the committee to call attention again to the fact that the question before this House is not what any returning board may or may not have done in this Louisiana contest. The fact is patent to every man who has listened to this discussion, or who is at all familiar with the events that have occurred in Louisiana during the last two years, that the returning boards are in such a mixed-up condition that no man can tell which was and which was not the legal board. The question resolves itself simply into this: What do the returns of the election show? Did the Lynch board have any returns before them? The Lynch board swear they did not have any returns. Were there returns made? It is conceded that returns were made. What did those returns show? They showed my election by 10,614 majority. Was there fraud sufficient to overturn that majority? Concede to Mr. Pinchback all the frauds he claims and I am still elected. The question, then, before the House rises above the question of returning boards, above Lynch and Warmoth and Longstreet and everybody else; it is the question of the right of eight hundred thousand people to representation on this floor. I present a claim before you, based upon the returns of the election. And my friend presents a claim before you, based on the dictum of the Lynch board, which he himself acknowledges were not in possession of returns.

He holds this House to its consistency. He says you must not make flesh of one and fowl of the other. He says that you have made flesh of Mr. SYPHER, and that therefore you must make flesh of him. God knows you do not want any more such flesh as Mr. SYPHER here. If you made flesh in that case you made a mistake, and there is no reason why you should make the same mistake in the case of my friend, Mr. Pinchback.

The republican party will live, and the democratic party will live, whether you seat Mr. Pinchback or seat me on this floor; that does not depend upon our being seated or unseated. I say that under any circumstances you may choose to invent, save the actual taking of the Lynch board returns, I am elected. Give Mr. Pinchback the republican vote and me the democratic vote of 1870 in these parishes and I am elected. Put the returns of the Lynch board in the disputed parishes in place of the returns of the Foreman board, and I am elected. Throw out the disputed parishes altogether and I am elected. There were 120,000 undisputed votes cast in that State, and of them I have a majority. As the judgment of the committee is that both certificates are worthless, thus it would seem to me to be but fair and honest that the man having the best showing should be entitled to the seat on this floor, leaving to the other the right of contest.

During the foregoing debate the following messages were received:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has received a printed memorial with printed signatures of Harper & Brothers, George Jones, D. Appleton & Co., and many others, leading publishing houses of the United States, in regard to the postage on newspapers; but the memorial, signatures, and all being printed, the Chair regards it as not within the rule and does not present it.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE presented a petition of citizens of Alabama, praying that the tax levied and collected on cotton for the years 1866, 1867, and 1868 be refunded; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCCREERY presented a memorial of manufacturers of chewing-tobacco in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, protesting against the amendment to the tax bill passed by the House of Representatives allowing a drawback on all chewing-tobacco exported in which licorice paste is a component part to the extent of the import duty charged on licorice paste; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Paul Frank, late colonel of the Fifty-second New York Volunteers, praying to be allowed an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of E. D. Morgan & Co., Brown Brothers & Co., Morton, Bliss & Co., and twenty-four other banking houses of New York City, remonstrating against the imposition of a tax on sales of coin and securities; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of banks and savings institutions of the city of Brooklyn, the memorial of F. Schuchardt & Sons, Lanman & Kemp, and other bankers and shippers of New York City, and a memorial of bankers, importers, and merchants of New York City, remonstrating against the imposition of a tax on sales of coin and securities; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Harper & Brothers and other publishing firms of New York and other cities in favor of the establishment of a fixed rate per pound on all newspapers and other periodicals and prepayment of postage; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORDON presented the memorial of Roderick Rutland, a citizen of Monroe County, Georgia, asking the cancellation of land warrant No. 97187 and the reissue to him of the same or a duplicate thereof, the original being alleged to have been stolen from him; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Georgia, praying for the erection of a light-house at the mouth of Jekyl Creek in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of D. Scott Edings, of Charleston, South Carolina, praying to be reinstated in the possession of two plantations near Paris Island, in the county of Charleston, South Carolina, sold under the act of July 8, 1872, providing for the collection of direct taxes upon real property situated in the insurrectionary States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONOVER, presented a resolution of the city council of the city of Fernandina, Florida, praying an appropriation of money for the improvement of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. OGLESBY presented papers in relation to the claim of Elizabeth Loebrick, for services as a hospital nurse rendered during the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of Robert H. Anderson, of Savannah, Georgia, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TREATY WITH BELGIUM.

Mr. CAMERON. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 107) providing for the termination of the treaty between the United States and His Majesty the King of the Belgians, concluded at Washington, July 17, 1858, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Its preamble recites that it is provided by the seventeenth article of the treaty between the United States of America on the one part, and His Majesty the King of the Belgians on the other part, concluded at Washington on the 17th of July, 1858, that "the present treaty shall be in force during ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications, and until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall have announced to the other its intention to terminate the operation thereof, each party reserving to itself the right of making such declaration to the other at the end of the ten years above mentioned; and it is agreed that, after the expiration of the twelve months' prolongation accorded on both sides, this treaty and all its stipulations shall cease to be in force;" and that it is no longer for the interest of the United States to continue the treaty in force. The resolution therefore provides that notice be given of the termination of the treaty according to the provisions of the seventeenth article thereof for such termination; and the President of the United States is authorized to communicate such notice to the government of the kingdom of Belgium.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2770) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States,'" approved August 6, 1856, to report the same back favorably. I will state that there was a Senate bill upon the same subject which provided that a majority of the whole number of judges of the Court of Claims should constitute a quorum, while the House bill provides that three judges shall constitute a quorum. With the present number of judges, the two bills of course accomplish precisely the same result, inasmuch as five judges now compose the Court of Claims. If in the future, as in the past, the number of judges should be increased, then the House bill would be wrong again. As the present law is, it allows two out of five to be a quorum. Inasmuch as it is late in the session, the committee have thought it best on the whole to report the House bill so as to save any further trouble about it.

I am therefore instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 751) to constitute a quorum and to regulate the proceedings of the Court of Claims, to report the same adversely. The committee think as I said that the Senate bill is the better; but to save time at present we let it go the other way, and let this be indefinitely postponed.

The Senate bill No. 751 was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes, to report the same back and ask to be discharged from its consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Committee on the Judiciary are unable to perceive that that part of the bill respecting repealing the Sanborn contract business is a subject with which we have anything to do; and the other branch of the bill providing punishments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates for acting as agents &c., is the law already, as it respects all proceedings except those in the regular judicial courts of the United States. The Committee are of opinion that there is no need to have any fresh enactment on the subject of Senators and Representatives in Congress being connected with claims against the Government. That is prohibited already. In respect to counsel being employed in a regular court of the United States, as the custom has been, the committee do not think it necessary at this time to recommend any legislation, so that so far as we are concerned the only subject is that of the repeal of the Sanborn contract law, so called, with which our committee has nothing to do. We therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and I was directed to move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. I believe, however, that the bill which contains this provision came from the Committee on Appropriations originally; but in obedience to the direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3098) to amend the act entitled "An act to reorganize the courts in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1594) for the punishment of extortion by officers or persons acting under the authority of the United States, to report the same adversely. The law already is ample for the punishment of all officers of the United States for extortion. The House bill takes one step further, and provides for punishing any person who acts under the authority of the United States for extortion. Inasmuch as nobody but an officer acting under the authority of the United States can be guilty of extortion except those persons who may be embraced in the bill I have just referred to who were authorized to take the place of officers in enforcing the law, and as the committee infer that that law will not stand long, we think it unnecessary to legislate upon the subject, and we therefore recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 752) to compel the performance of certain duties by clerks of courts and other officers of the United States, to report the same favorably with sundry amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3516) to make valid asssignments of wages or salaries of officers, agents, or employés of the Government, to report the same adversely. The committee are of the opinion, I believe unanimously, that such a bill is against the whole policy of the law for the protection of persons employed by the Government and against all principles of law in providing for assignments of wages not yet earned; and while it may have some advantages in particular respects, on the whole would be found to work extremely disastrously both to the interests of the United States and of the great number of persons whom it is obliged to employ. We are therefore of opinion that it ought to be indefinitely postponed.

The bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 16) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, with the amendment of the House of Representatives thereto, to report the same with the recommendation that the bill and amendment be indefinitely postponed, with a written report. This being what is called the Sutro-Tunnel and Mining Company bill, I suppose the parties on both sides wish to have it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) It will be placed on the Calendar. Does the Senator wish to have the report printed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1589) for the relief of Henry Savage, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States in Guatemala, from May 7, 1856, to November 14, 1858, have directed me to report it back adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I am also directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3351) to ascertain the possessory rights of the Hudson's Bay Company and other British subjects within the limits which were subject of the award of His Majesty the Emperor of Germany under the treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, and for other purposes, to report it back favorably and without amendment. An early passage of this bill is necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of people up there under the late treaty with England, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have reported half a dozen bills from the Judiciary Committee this morning to which there can be no objection; but which in justice to bills reported yesterday and before and on the Calendar, I thought ought to take their place there; and I think so as to this and every other bill in respect to which there is not some very urgent public necessity. I therefore ask that it go on the Cal endar.

Mr. CAMERON. Cannot I convince the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes on the Calendar.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3266) for the relief of the Pekin Alcohol Manufacturing Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to report a bill this morning from the Joint Committee of Investigation into the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

The bill (S. No. 913) for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ALLISON. I also report the testimony taken by the joint committee and ask for a formal order for the printing of it. I would state, however, that the whole of the testimony is printed, the usual number of copies having been printed at the request of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order for printing the usual number will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the usual number is already printed, that ought not to be done. We do not want a duplicate print.

Mr. ALLISON. The testimony has been printed, but there has been no formal order of the Senate authorizing it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you will see to it of course that it is not duplicated.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state that the committee would be glad to have the bill that I have reported considered at as early a time as is practicable. We expect to make some further report upon the testimony and the bill within a very few days, and then I shall ask that the Senate take the bill up and put it on its passage.

Mr. SCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution referred to them directing them to inquire whether the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act approved July 12, 1870, regulating the disposition of balances of unexpended appropriations, have been duly observed and executed, and whether any further provisions of law are required to secure the covering into the Treasury of balances of unexpended appropriations. The inquiries made by the committee satisfied them that whenever this law had not been complied with, or at least in the majority of cases, the non-compliance arose from the construction placed on the law by the Departments, in which, however, the committee did not agree; but as the evil complained of has been remedied by bills passed at this session, the committee now ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2211) for the relief of Beck & Wirth, to report the same back without amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the Senate take action on that bill now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must insist that it go on the Calendar unless there be some special reason.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill has been before the House and Senate for a long time, and it is a matter of very great importance to the parties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can take it up to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. To-morrow is for the Military Committee. This is from the Finance Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is impossible for us to reach the bills upon the Calendar that are reported in the same way, bills to which there is no objection, unless we take the morning to report bills and then go to the Calendar. As I have objected to others I must to this one.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator did not object when a bill was called up a moment ago and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know it then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Vermont to object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SCOTT. A few days since an order was made authorizing a claimant to withdraw from the files the papers after his case had been recommitted to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the case of James B. Gillespie and that he have leave to withdraw his papers, leaving copies.

It was so ordered.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1564) establishing life-saving stations, and appropriating therefor, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2179) to incorporate the Inland and Sea-board Coasting Company of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McCREARY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 255) to authorize the President of the United States to request the republic of Hayti to indemnify Antonio Pelletier, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 921) to prevent the useless slaughter of buffaloes within the Territories of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for the repeal of all laws exempting church property from taxation in the Territories and District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3428) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3431) authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona, no longer required for military purposes, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2939) to compensate D. R. Haggard for six months' services as colonel of the Fifth Kentucky United States Cavalry Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3335) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a right of way across a corner of the Fort Gratiot military reservation to the City Railroad Company, Port Huron, Michigan, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2892) for the relief of Thomas Simms, late a lieutenant in the Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Finance, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 653) to relieve E. Boyd Pendleton, late collector of internal revenue of the fifth district of Virginia, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. There is an additional report in writing.

The report was ordered to be printed, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3332) to fix the time for the election of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the State of Mississippi, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage.

Mr. ALCORN. That bill is one which is intended to harmonize the elections in the State of Mississippi, and it is important to that State. There will be no objection to it I am sure, and I trust it will be considered at once. It contains nothing that concerns any one or anything except the harmony of the elections in Mississippi.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred sundry petitions, praying Congress to provide for the settlement of international difficulties by arbitration, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the United States having at heart the cause of peace everywhere, and hoping to help its permanent establishment between nations, hereby recommend the adoption of arbitration as a great and practical method for the determination of international differences, to be maintained sincerely and in good faith, so that war may cease to be regarded as a proper form of trial between nations.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, it was Ordered, That House bill No. 2246, relating to circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama, be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 914) to establish a commercial railway; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. I present this bill by request. I have not read it, and do not know what it contains. I move that it be referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 915) to establish certain post routes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 916) for the relief of Mrs. Ann Cornelia Lanman; which was was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 918) for the benefit of Mrs. Fanny S. Conway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The whole subject of the distribution of the laws was on my motion referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and yesterday I ought not to have allowed the bill that was passed for the printing of the revised statutes to go without being referred to that committee. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, with a view of referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill has gone to the House, and I offer the following order to bring it back:

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 3652) providing for publication of the revised statutes of the United States.

The order was agreed to.

THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to say that I find on the desks of Senators this morning the post-route bill. Under the new rule of the Senate, amendments to that bill are required to be submittted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads so that the bill may be perfected. I hope Senators will observe the rule and send in the amendments, if the bill as it is at present does not satisfy them.

MAIL SERVICE WITH CHINA.

Mr. SCOTT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire whether or not the steamships in the ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China under the acts of February 17, 1865, and of June 1, 1872, have been subjected to inspection and surveyed by a United States naval constructor, and so constructed as to be readily adjusted to the armed naval service of the United States in case of war; the utility of the vessels for such service; and whether any further legislation is necessary to secure to the United States the right to take said steamships for the use of the Government in case of war, as provided by said acts.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution of final adjournment does not specify the hour at which the Presiding Officers of the two Houses shall adjourn them. Although I do not suppose that is necessary, it would be rather awkward that one House should be sitting, though it could not transact any legislative business, when the other had adjourned. I offer this resolution as supplementary to the existing resolution:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House adjourn their respective Houses on Monday, the 22d day of June instant, at one o'clock p. m.

Mr. CONKLING. I am for this resolution if it is the best way to accomplish the purpose. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island, however, whether there is not some danger in this? We adopted a resolution which did fix an hour. That resolution still lies on the table of the House, as this will when we send it, and it was just like this except that I think the hour named there was twelve and this is one o'clock. Is the House any more likely to act on this resolution than on the other?

Again, having already fixed the day so that at the end of that parliamentary day, whatever the hour may be, the final adjournment takes place, if the Senate passes another resolution may we not unsettle the understanding so far as it exists now? I make this inquiry not in the nature of an objection, but only for the purpose of asking the Senator whether he is rendering more certain than it is now the termination of the session. If he is, I am for the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose the termination of the session is rendered certain at the end of the parliamentary day of Monday, June 22, which I suppose will be Tuesday at twelve o'clock. If this resolution does not meet with the assent of the House, the matter remains just as it is now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Suppose the House amend this resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. If we should not concur in the amendment the matter would remain as it is. This does not affect the original resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say in this connection, inasmuch as I moved the concurrence of the Senate in the House resolution, which did not fix the precise hour of that day, that I understood the history of it to be this: The House had no objection to agreeing to the day named by the Senate, but the Senate resolution was in such a condition (if I may so far refer to the proceedings in the House) that it could not be reached in the regular course for a long time. The House of Representatives therefore thought it better to send us a resolution of its own, and sent it in the form we agreed to; that is, naming the day, but instead of fixing the hour, provided that when the two Houses adjourned on that day, it should be final. The object of that, as I had reason to suppose, was, that inasmuch as there was some doubt whether the appropriation bills, as some people thought, could be finished, it might be necessary to prolong the session of that day beyond the usual hour of adjournment of the two Houses toward the next day so far as might be necessary, and that provided a little elasticity in the thing, so that if anything necessary to be done should not be quite accomplished, there would be a leeway of a few hours in which it could be accomplished.

It struck me in the then condition of affairs that that was an entirely appropriate thing to do. Of course, as soon as either House on that day chooses to adjourn it ends the session, because the other House then cannot do any legislative business that will amount to anything. I was quite willing for one to put myself and the Senate in the power of the House of Representatives to adjourn us on that day at the very moment of meeting if it thought best; and I was sure the Senate would be willing to take the responsibility of being able to determine for itself also how early on that day we should terminate our legislative business. I do not think it at all important, therefore, that we should pass this resolution; but if it had been an original proposition, as the original Senate resolution was, I should have named the hour.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the resolution lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be laid aside.

LIEUTENANT JOSEPH WHEATON.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 418.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 418) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Third Auditor of the Treasury to settle and adjust the claim of Susan Dayton Anderson, administratrix de bonis non of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, for the half-pay due him under the act of Congress of October 21, 1780, as a lieutenant of infantry in the Rhode Island Line during the revolutionary war; and in the settlement and adjustment of the claim the principles recognized and embraced in the decision of the Court of Claims of the United States in the case of Thomas H. Baird, administrator of Dr. Absolom Baird, deceased, and which was sanctioned by an act of Congress approved August 18, 1856, are to be accepted by the Third Auditor as the basis on which such settlement and adjustment shall be made; but upon the final settlement and adjustment of the claim there is to be deducted from the amount ascertained to be due all moneys paid, by commutation or otherwise, on account of half-pay.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee reported that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read. I have heard of that case before.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Before the report is read I will ask leave to amend the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the report had better be read first. The bill will probably require a good many amendments.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Very well.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JOHNSTON on the 3d of February last:

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Susan Dayton Anderson, administratrix de bonis non of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, report:

That at the second session of the Forty-second Congress a report was made in this case, which, as it embodies all the facts, is now adopted by the committee, and is as follows:

"The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the administratrix of the estate of the late lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, and the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of the 27th of March, 1872, relative to the same, report:

"That the evidence before the committee shows that Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton served in the Rhode Island Line from the commencement to the close of the revolutionary war; that his father and ten brothers all held commissions as officers in the British service, and that he alone sacrificed his home and domestic ties for the cause of liberty; that he was disinherited by his father, Colonel Caleb Wheaton, who commanded a regiment of British pioneers, who, to the day of his death, never forgave his son for what he considered a disloyalty to the King of Great Britain in joining 'the Yankee rebels;' that on the 11th day of May, 1775, and long before war was declared, he joined a band of volunteers, and took an active part in capturing the Margaretta and two other armed British schooners, which was of great service to us in after times, and was the first advantage gained over our enemies on the waters. In this service he received a severe saber wound on the head, which troubled his mind through life, and terminated in his dying in the insane asylum, in Baltimore, in the year 1828.

"After the war was declared, Joseph Wheaton joined the Rhode Island Line in Colonel Israel Angell's regiment, and sharing in all the battles in which that part of the Army was engaged, which seems to have been many, never left his regiment until the end of the war. He was invested with a commission as colonel in the war of 1812, through the whole of which he served with distinguished ability.

"By the acts of Congress of 3d and 21st of October, 1780, the Government of the United States promised to pay to each and all of the officers, individually, who should continue to serve until the end of the war half-pay for life, and to pay the same to said officers, or their legal representatives, in specie or other current money, at the end of each and every year for life. This was a distinct offer and covenant, stipulated by the most solemn act of the Government in 1780 after four years and upward of hard service in field and camp by Joseph Wheaton, among others, and was offered as an inducement to cause him to continue in the service until defeat or victory should mark the close of the contest. If defeated, he with his compeers had nothing to hope for but the rebel's fate; if victorious, he would have the stipulated compensation of the promised half-pay to buy him bread for the balance of his days. He accepted the offer, fulfilled the contract, and served to the end of the war, thus establishing his unqualified right to said half-pay.

"It was decided by the Court of Claims in the case of Thomas H. Baird, administrator of Dr. Absalom Baird, deceased, that the acts of Congress of 3d and 21st of October, 1780, created a legal liability against the United States in favor of the officers therein referred to, which no subsequent legislation by Congress could release without the assent of the other party. Your committee find that this decision of the Court of Claims was sanctioned by Congress by an act approved August 18, 1856.

"The Committee on Revolutionary Claims in the Thirty-sixth Congress made a favorable report in this case, and in the Thirty-seventh Congress the claim was referred by resolution of the House to the Secretary of the Interior for adjustment. In reply, the Secretary of the Interior submits the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 27, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted on the 14th instant, referring to this Department for adjustment the claim of Mary A. Berault, administratrix of the late Joseph Wheaton.

Upon an examination of the papers referred to me, I am fully satisfied of the justice of this claim, and concur in the report of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims in its favor. The services of Lieutenant Wheaton were of a highly meritorious character, and continued from a time anterior to the passage of the act of Congress of October, 1780, promising half-pay for life to those who should serve until the end of the war, until the final and successful termination of the revolutionary struggle.

The principle upon which the claim is based has been recognized and sustained by the Court of Claims, in the case of Dr. Baird, and the decision of that court has received the sanction of Congress.

I should not hesitate to adjust and allow the claim, as recommended by the resolution of the House of Representatives, if any fund were placed at my disposal from which it could be paid; but no appropriation has been made which is applicable to the payment of claims of this character.

I therefore return the papers, with a recommendation that an appropriation be made by Congress for its payment.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

CALEB B. SMITH,
Secretary of the Interior.

Hon. GALUSHA A. GROW,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"At the last session of the Forty-first Congress the claim was passed by the House by a two-thirds vote, and this committee unanimously reported in favor of its passage by the Senate, but owing to the lateness of the session no action was taken upon it by the Senate.

"Your committee are of opinion, from a careful examination of the case, that this claim is embraced within the acts of the 3d and 21st of October, 1780. The half-pay should terminate on the 24th day of March, 1818, when Lieutenant Wheaton was placed on the pension-roll, and there should be deducted from the said half-pay any payments made by the Government to said Wheaton on account of his said services.

"Your committee report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage."

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to amend the bill by striking out in section 1, line 5, the words "administratrix de bonis non of the estate" and inserting the words "only child."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill what is the purpose of that amendment. If this money is due to anybody it is due to the legal representatives of Lieutenant Wheaton, and the only discharge that we can get from this contract, as it is reported to be a contract, must be from the administrator of that estate. Who are the heirs of this estate it will be quite impossible for Congress after a period of ninety years to ascertain very easily; and if, as the committee report, this is a claim of legal obligation that Congress cannot set aside, and for that a decision of the Court of Claims is cited—I say nothing about the goodness of the law—but I say if that is so, then the only safety of the United States is to pay the money to an administrator, and let the administrator hunt up the persons to whom by the laws of descent it should legally go. For the United States to undertake to say it shall be paid to the only child, is undertaking to say what the law, if it is a contract, does not allow us to say. If we are bound to pay, as the report states we are, then we are bound to pay the estate of the officer as a matter of obligation, and any creditor of that officer at the time of his death is entitled first under the laws of all civilized communities to be paid out of it, and after that the administrator, according to the laws of the State where this gentleman died, would distribute the remainder under the direction of those laws. I hope therefore the Senator will explain to us upon what principle it is, consistent with this bill, he proposes, that we shall not pay the legal representatives of this deceased officer, but shall pay his only child, it being, as the report states, a matter of absolute and binding legal obligation, a debt that the United States owed to this man in his life-time.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I suppose, as Lieutenant Wheaton has been dead since 1828, any debts against his estate would be barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is not this barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. JOHNSTON. This is a debt due from the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is not that barred by the statute the same as private debts?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think the United States would hardly plead the statute of limitations against a soldier who served it so faithfully.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the United States has done a wrong to this soldier by withholding money due him, so that it ought not to plead the statute of limitations, then the creditors of this soldier had nothing they could get hold of in respect to this fund, as they could not sue the United States. If therefore we are to do justice, being under this legal obligation and the statute of limitations has nothing to do with it on our part, then most certainly in order to guard ourselves against claims by the creditors of this person or other people as heirs we ought to provide distinctly, as the bill originally did, that the money should be paid to an administrator or administratrix. That being done, if we are under a legal obligation, as the report says we are, our duty is discharged, and we shall not at the next session or some other, as has sometimes been the case—not about this sort of claims perhaps—be called upon——

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will withdraw the amendment and let the bill go as it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to withdraw my speech or allow the amendment to be withdrawn until I finish the sentence that I was engaged in; but as the Senator has put into the middle of my sentence what I was in hopes of accomplishing, I will forgive him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. You want to save time, and so do I.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I want to do right, whether time is saved or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is much more serious than Senators imagine when looking at it as a little bill for a private claim. I suppose the claim itself, with interest, &c.—because I see there is no limitation about paying interest or any other thing—will amount perhaps to ten or fifteen thousand dollars. The Senator perhaps can inform me how much the claim will amount to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have never made any calculation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In some claims of a similar character that have been presented to Congress within my recollection, but which did not get through, it was found on looking at the frame of the bills and computing the interest on the claim as a debt which the United States were bound to pay, putting it on that theory, that each individual claim would run up to something very prodigious. I cannot say how much this would amount to; but you can imagine that it would be very large if you calculate annual interest on a sum of money for ninety years, even if it was a very small one originally. Suppose the half-pay of an officer in an eight years' war amounted to only $500 a year, what would it come to? Suppose his pay was only $1,000—take it at that to illustrate—he was entitled to half-pay from the end of the war, from 1783 to the year 1828, when he died.

Mr. JOHNSTON. To 1818, when he commenced drawing a pension.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What difference does that make to the contracts of the United States, if the Senator will tell me? I await a reply.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is proposed to deduct anything that he received for his services.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He did not receive a pension for services by a contract. A pension is not a contract. This is a most extraordinary state of things. Here is this officer so wronged to the United States that we have not paid him a sum of money due to him by a contract, a thing of absolute obligation; and now when we come to our senses and are disposed to do justice, we are going to turn around and offset a pension we gave him and take that out of the sum due him on a contract. Did he ever agree to that? I am astonished at it.

Now, let us begin again at where we were starting. This gentleman died, the report says, in 1828. The report does not say anything about a pension. That is something we know nothing about. This gentleman died in 1828. The war ended, according to the best of my recollection, in 1783; if I am wrong any Senator who was present at the time can correct me. [Laughter.] There are seventeen years in the last century and there are twenty-eight years in the present century, making forty-five years of half-pay at say $500 a year, which I take it is a very low estimate; but I do not wish to exaggerate this thing at all. There are $22,500 of absolute principal said by this bill to be due to this man as a matter of legal right, because by the act of the Continental Congress of 1780 it was provided that officers should have half-pay for the remainder of their lives, just as we provide that officers shall have thirty dollars per month and twenty-five dollars of a certain other class and twenty dollars of a certain other class during their lives by our pension acts. There are $22,500 to be paid to this officer. How did it happen, by the way, that this officer never made any claim upon the United States for any part of this $22,500, which had been accumulating down to the time of his death, or, to take it as the Senator puts it, down to the time when he got a pension in 1818? How did it happen that during all the time from 1783 to 1818, a period of thirty-five years, this gentleman, so far as the report shows, so far as the statements of the Department show, so far as we have any evidence at all, never made the slightest pretext that this old, obsolete act of Congress had anything to do with the subject? I will tell you how I think it happened, because this is a subject with which some committees that I have been connected with in times gone by have had considerable to do. Every year or two there would be a claim of this kind which in one way or another would be brought before us. It happened in this way: Soon after the war Congress found and these officers found and other people connected with the administration of the Army found that that provision could not be made effectual; in the first place that the sum to be paid was enormous in proportion to what it ought to be; that is to say it was vastly greater than any country had ever given by way of reward or pensions to the general body of its soldiers and officers. Therefore it was proposed, and it was done, that all this half-pay and other war claims should be commuted into pensions, and pensions were provided long before 1818, and parties got them from year to year as they made application to the proper officers then charged with the allowance of pensions for them. The consequence was that all these claims, if you could call them claims, all these rights if you could call them rights under the act of 1780 were considered as waived and lost and gone in the first decade of this present century. That is more than sixty years ago. That is the fact about it; and therefore this man in his lifetime, as did almost every one of the other officers of the Continental Line in their lifetimes, took voluntarily and gladly this new arrangement and provision that Congress had made for them, and from time to time, as they applied and proved the facts upon which they were entitled at all, received the pensions and provisions that Congress had made for them and abandoned all claim to this allowance.

It does happen that now and then some heir of some one of these ancient officers who served their country so well—not any better than officers have done since and not any worse; they did their duty—have made applications to Congress, and it would usually turn out on investigation that the claim had long since ceased to be the property of any one of the people or their descendants who were originally concerned in it, and it had come to be the property of some person who deals in claims as a mode of getting a subsistence. I do not by any means intimate that that is the case in this instance; and if it is a matter of legal right it does not make any difference whether it is or not. If the report is right in its principle that this is a debt which the United States cannot discharge itself from by repealing the statutes and providing the pensions and so on, and this officer never consented that the United States be discharged, then of course he had a perfectly good right to sell this claim, and any other person had a perfectly good right to buy it; and if he bought it at ten cents or ten dollars or twenty dollars or one hundred dollars, we are just as much bound to pay him as we were the original party. But if you put it upon the ground that we are performing an act of generosity, that we are doing an equity to somebody whom we have failed to fully provide for on account of his services to the public, then of course it is a material matter to inquire whether the person to whom this equity is to be done is going to get any benefit from it.

But I do not now speak of the subject upon that ground. I assume for the purposes of this argument that this claim belongs to the estate of this deceased officer, if it be a claim; but I do submit to my honorable friend from Virginia, who I know is careful of public interests, who I know does not intend to open the door here by a flat precedent of Congress for hundreds and thousands of similar applications made in behalf of the heirs of the great number of officers of the Continental Army for hundreds of thousands of dollars, where we all know as a matter of history, although we do not know it in each individual, that the claims as a body in the lifetime of the people who were concerned in them were abandoned and waived, and in lieu of them other provisions made by Congress for them were accepted and taken up—I submit that we should not take this step with our eyes closed to the consequence of establishing a precedent of this character. That is what I submit to the Senate and to the Senator from Virginia; and, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope this bill will be finished.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I must object and insist on the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we can finish this bill in a short time. We have to meet this question some day or other.

Mr. SHERMAN. But this is the only day I have for the moiety bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move to continue the consideration of the bill which was under consideration at the close of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not press that motion. The moiety bill is now pending before us and ought to be passed to-day. To-morrow is set apart for other business.

Mr. JOHNSTON. We can get a vote on this bill in a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. No private claim one hundred and fifty thousand years old ought to come in here to interfere with the current business of this generation.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If it is one hundred and fifty thousand years old, it ought to be paid if it is just.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, call it fifty years old or one hundred years old. I hope the Senate will go on with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 18.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 11, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Conover, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Merrimon, Mitchell, and Stewart—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Logan, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—41.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Pease, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, and Wadleigh—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. I ask permission to make a report at this time from the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11 and 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7 and 16, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of said House amendment the words "and the Signal Corps", and insert in lieu thereof the word "which;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3 and 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of the text of the bill all from and including the word "provided" in line 9, page 2, of the bill down to and including the word "transportation," being the last proviso of the paragraph; strike out also the words of amendment numbered 4; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same as so amended.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: Amend the text of the bill by inserting after the word "accounts," line 8, page 9 of the bill, (section 2,) the words "as have been reported to him for payment by the Quartermasters and the Commissary Departments," and the Senate agree to the same.

J. R. WEST,
J. W. STEVENSON,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. A. WHEELER,
S. S. MARSHALL,
LLOYD LOWNDES, JR.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the reading of but a few lines near the close of the bill as it has been agreed upon, fixing the mileage and allowances of Army officers. It was in the original bill very near the close, I think.

Mr. WEST. Perhaps I can explain how the amendment stands better than the Clerk can. There was a provision in the bill relating to mileage for all officers, to which there was a proviso stating that nothing herein should be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation. The Senate amended it by saying—

Except in cases where a greater sum has been paid for actual and necessary traveling expenses.

As a consequence the amendment of the Senate neutralized the proviso of the House, and the committee of conference agreed to strike out the proviso and the amendment that it neutralized, leaving it exactly as we substantially agreed on it.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask now to hear the words read as they stand in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this is going to take time I shall have to insist on its going over.

Mr. CONKLING. My request will take no time. I only want to have those lines read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The clause in the bill in which these words are found was as follows:

Provided, That only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person whatever in the service of the United States, and all allowances for mileages and transportation in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal; and no credit shall be allowed to any of the disbursing officers of the United States for payment or allowances in violation of this provision: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to allow more than ten cents a mile for such transportation.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not hear all of the explanation made by the Senator from Louisiana, but I infer from the reading of the bill that it stands in substance as it came to us originally.

Mr. WEST. Very much; but I can tell you exactly how it is.

Mr. CONKLING. That general understanding is enough for my present purpose, which is to suggest that the effect will be to unsettle the compensation, virtually to destroy the compensation and probably to vacate the positions held by a large number of public employés scattered all over the country and having nothing to do with the Army. I think it is right since my attention has been called to the matter to make that one remark, and invite the attention of others to it.

The report was concurred in.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. ALCORN, on his motion, was excused from serving on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2694) for the relief of Benjamin W. Reynolds.

Mr. WADLEIGH, on his motion, was excused from further service on the Committee on Public Lands, and Mr. HARVEY was appointed to fill the vacancy.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 8th instant approved and signed the act (S. No. 229) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize-lists.

The message also announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 369) to change the name of the registered steamer Oakes Ames to Champlain;

An act (S. No. 708) to change the name of the schooner China; and

An act (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk, and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse.

MOIETIES UNDER CUSTOMS LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Finance was in section (6) 8, line 11, after the word "relate," to strike out the words, "provided that in every such case, whenever the officer or person entitled to any share in the fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall appear as a witness;" in line 14, before the words "the defendant," to insert the words "and in every such case;" and in the same line, before the word "testify," to insert the words "appear and;" so that the section will read:

SEC. [6] 8. That no officer or other person entitled to or claiming compensation under any provision of this act shall be thereby disqualified from becoming a witness in any action, suit, or proceeding for the recovery, mitigation, or remission thereof, but shall be subject to examination and cross-examination in like manner with other witnesses, without being thereby deprived of any right, title, share, or interest in any fine, penalty, or forfeiture to which such examination may relate; and in every such case the defendant or defendants may appear and testify and be examined and cross-examined in like manner.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a mere change of phraseology.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. Section [7] 9 was read:

SEC. [7] 9. That except in the case of personal effects accompanying the passenger, no importation exceeding $100 in dutiable value shall be admitted to entry without the production of a duly-certified invoice thereof as required by law, or of an affidavit made by the owner, importer, or consignee, before any officer authorized to administer oaths, showing why it is impracticable to produce such invoice.

Mr. CONKLING. As the most economical way of proceeding with this bill probably is to refer to such things as occur as we pass along, I here call attention to the fact that by this section in the city of New York alone upward of two thousand notaries public are authorized to administer the oaths on which this proceeding is to be based. I do not dwell upon it. Of course the Senate is aware that notaries public are men of all professions, not only lawyers but clerks in banks and elsewhere, men entirely unfamiliar with this matter, men whose handwritings are not known at all; and of course it opens a very wide door for every sort of imposition that may be practiced by the forging of a jurat, and from that up there are manifold ways which it must appear to everybody can be resorted to to practice imposition under a section of this sort. Without making any motion about it, I simply call attention to its effects in that one respect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt some possible criticism might be made; but under the present system a custom-house oath is usually made before a custom-house officer, and taken in so hurried a way that it is not even read. Indeed, I happened to be in the New York custom-house once or twice and saw these oaths administered. I thought of all the shameless carelessness with which an oath could be administered it was the worst of all. I suppose this is an attempt to correct that, to require the jurat to be made before a proper officer authorized to administer oaths. I am not sufficiently informed as to the reasons for this section to know what they were, but I presume the purpose was to avoid this mode of administering oaths in the custom-houses, where the book is handed to a man with the words "You say so," or "It is so," and the thing is done in the greatest possible hurry.

Mr. CONKLING. In reply to the Senator from Ohio I would say that my attention has long been fixed upon the inconvenience of requiring men to go to the custom-house to make an oath before a particular officer or one of two officers. I have long thought there should be a provision by which offices should be fixed in a city so large as New York at different points, and some persons there stationed authorized to administer an oath. Such an arrangement would have provided according to the discretion of the law or the Department a half dozen or a dozen persons conveniently located about the city for this purpose. I have no doubt the Senator from Ohio is quite right, indeed I know he is, in saying that great haste and much inconvenience arise from requiring the large number of papers which must be verified to be verified at one place in so large a city, and before one or a very few officers there stationed; but the Senator from Ohio must see that when you allow not only an oath to be taken, but something more to be done before officers who have no seal, including every justice of the peace, every commissioner of deeds, every notary public, and that in a city where of notaries public alone there are more than two thousand, men of all employments, of all professions, not even lawyers, without any skill whatever in this business, you open a door very wide. I said "something more than an oath to be taken;" and in order to direct attention to what I mean, I will read this section:

SEC. [7] 8. That except in the case of personal effects accompanying the passenger, no importation exceeding $100 in dutiable value shall be admitted to entry without the production of a duly certified invoice thereof as required by law, or of an affidavit made by the owner, importer, or consignee, before any officer authorized to administer oaths, showing why it is impracticable to produce such invoice.

If it were merely the taking of a stereotyped oath, if it were merely to verify a certain paper, the danger here would be much less; but this is to be an affidavit in no common form, an affidavit which in every case must be special, pointing out the reasons for the non-production of a paper. Everybody must see that when the oath is not taken in the presence of the officer, when he does not see the paper, when he does not know how the affidavit was or what it stated when sworn to, but it is taken somewhere else, before an officer whose signature he does not know at all, whether anything is interlined afterward, what may be interpolated, what may occur to this affidavit before it comes to stand in the place of the invoice, become matters of great uncertainty, it seems to me. And as I am commenting upon this, I will say in the same breath that when we reach a later section of this bill I intend, if the time shall be convenient, to endeavor to point out that in addition to abolishing moieties and in addition to breaking up the acts under which books and papers may be inspected, we are proceeding in this bill to matters entirely foreign to those topics and in a way which I cannot doubt, with all the information I can get in regard to it, is to expose the collection of the revenue to great and unnecessary hazard.

This is one thing, and it is comparatively a slight thing; I will not dwell upon it; but, as I say, when we reach a later section I shall venture to point out various objections in it into one of which this will enter, which I hope may induce the committee to modify so far these provisions as to close some of these loop-holes.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read section [8] 10, as follows:

SEC. [8] 10. That no entry shall be made in the absence of a certified invoice, upon affidavit as aforesaid, unless such affidavit be accompanied by a statement, in the form of an invoice or otherwise, showing either the actual cost of the merchandise included in such importation, or, to the best of the knowledge, information, and belief of the deponent, the foreign market value thereof; which statement shall be verified by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent desiring to make entry of the merchandise, and which oath shall be administered by the collector or his deputy.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I stop there a moment in the hope that I may invite the attention of some Senators to that. Compare these two sections. The first requires an oath which might be of some value, and it ought to be of some value. Why? Because it is an oath to be taken by the owner, importer, or consignee. Each one of these persons has knowledge of this matter. If perjury is committed, he might be convicted of perjury because you could show what the law terms the scienter. When you come to the next section, having provided that the owner may come before anybody authorized to administer an oath and take the oath, you require the next verification to be before a custom-house officer. That is wise so far as to who is to verify. Read this section:

Which statement shall be verified by the owner, importer, consignee, or agent desiring to make entry of the merchandise.

That every man knows means a custom-house broker. First, the consignee may go before a notary public or anybody else, and take this oath which is prescribed. That advances one step. When you come to the real test of the matter you require the oath to be taken before the custom-house officer. Who is to do that? Nobody is required to do it but the custom-house broker, and the next section should be read in connection with this in order to appreciate the value or the want of value in this provision:

That before such oath is taken, it shall be lawful for the collector or deputy administering the same to question the deponent touching the sources of his knowledge—

Whose knowledge? The consignee's or the owner's? Not at all, but the broker's—touching the sources of his knowledge, information, or belief in the premises, and to require him to make oath to the same, and to produce any letter or paper in his possession or under his control.

Whose control? Under the control of the broker or agent. Observe the effect of this. I am an importer, and I mean to smuggle even within the narrow limits assigned to smuggling by a preceding section. I am part and heart of the whole transaction. I have papers and books which show that the transaction was manifestly one of smuggling. When I reach the point in the proceeding which we have now reached in this bill, I hand over the formal affidavit with the invoice to a custom-house broker, and go my way. The custom-house broker goes down. The official before whom he is to make the verification examines him as to the sources of his, the broker's, information, and asks him whether he has any papers in his possession, and when they have exhausted him, that is the end of the whole proceeding; and the bill draws between me and my agent a line, on one side of which be my case never so fraudulent I may stay in security, and on the other side of which the broker is operating, and the law entirely falling short of reaching me.

Now, I think if this bill were attracting a little more attention, if the Senators here were not so few and the thing treated with so much indifference as it is, in addition to that which the bill previously does, namely, sweeping away moieties, so called, and repealing the section by which inquest may be had of books and papers, I can hardly think the judgment of the Senate would say that a provision was wise committing to a broker or an agent the whole power of making the oath upon such information as may be given to him which is to carry merchandise through the custom-house and subject it, as far as it is to be subjected at all, to the duties upon it.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section [10] 12, line 13, to strike out the words "a joint or several actions," and to insert the words "an action in the name of the United States;" so that the clause will read:

Shall severally forfeit and pay a fine of not more than $5,000 for each offense, to be recovered by an action in the name of the United States, in any district court or circuit court of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) This amendment will be considered as agreed to if there is no objection.
